

Statue of a Roman Magistrate
Sion House

THE MIND OF ROME

Contributions by CYRIL BAILEY J. BELL
I. G. BARRINGTON-WARD · T. F. HIGHAM
A. N. BRYAN-BROWN H E BUTLER
MAURICE PLATNAUER
CHARLES SINGER

Edited by CYRIL BAILEY

OXFORD
AT THE CLARENDON PRESS
MCMXXVI

*Printed in England
At the Cambridge University Press
By John Johnson
In care of the University*

P R E F A C E

THIS book is a companion to R W Livingstone's Pageant of Greece, and is intended primarily for those who know no Latin but wish to form some idea of the great Latin writers and what they wrote. Its plan is in the main the same—the various departments of Latin literature have been dealt with separately and each section is designed to show the historical development of its particular branch. As several writers have contributed to the book there are inevitably certain minor differences in style and treatment but we have done our best by cross references and other means to link the whole book together and to make it fundamentally uniform.

We have for the most part chosen our translations from standard versions already published but where there is no translator's name appended it is to be assumed that the rendering is by the writer of the section. We wish to make grateful acknowledgement for leave to use the following copyright translations:

Accius in M S Dimsdale's History of Latin Literature (Heinemann) and in J Wight Duff's Literary History of Rome (Fisher Unwin), Apuleius Adlington (Loeb Classical Library) and Pater (Macmillan & Co.), Aulus Gellus Mason (Journal of Education), Calpurnius E J L Scott (Bell & Sons), Cicero H E D Blakiston (revised versions of translations originally published by Methuen & Co.), F. Brooks (Methuen & Co.), G. E. Jeans (Macmillan & Co.), Sir W. Peterson (Macmillan & Co.), H. Rackham (Loeb Classical Library), J. S. Reid (Macmillan & Co.), E. S. Shuckburgh (Bell & Sons), J. S. Watson (Bohn Library; Bell & Sons), and E. O. Winstedt (Loeb Classical Library); Ennius, in M. S. Dimsdale's History of Latin Literature (Heinemann); Fronto, C. R. Haines (Loeb Classical Library); Horace, C. S. Calverley (Bell & Sons), J. Conington (Bell & Sons), F. Coutts (John Lane), and A. S. Way (A. S. Way and Macmillan & Co.); Juvenal, in H. L. Rogers and T. R. Harley's Roman Home Life and Religion (Clarendon Press); Laberius, in M. S. Dimsdale's History of Latin Literature (Heinemann), and in J. Wight Duff's Literary History of Rome (Fisher Unwin); Livy, W. L. Roberts (Dent & Sons); Lucretius, Sir R. Allison (A. L. Humphreys) and W. E. Leonard (Dent & Sons); Martial, W. J. Courthope (John Murray); Ovid, F. A. Wright (Routledge) and in H. E. Butler's Quintilian (Loeb Classical Library); Pacuvius, in H. E. Butler's Quintilian (Loeb Classical Library) and in J. Wight Duff's Literary History of Rome (Fisher Unwin); Petronius, M. Heseltine (Loeb Classical Library) and in H. L. Rogers and T. R. Harley's Roman Home Life and Religion (Clarendon Press); Plautus, E. H. Sugden (Allen & Unwin) and in H. L. Rogers and T. R. Harley's Roman Home Life and Religion (Clarendon Press); Pliny, W. Melmoth (Loeb Classical Library); Porcius Licinius, in J. Wight Duff's Literary History of Rome (Fisher Unwin); Propertius, Cranstoun (Blackwood); Publilius Syrus, in M. S. Dimsdale's History of Latin Literature (Heinemann); Quintilian, H. E. Butler (Loeb Classical Library); Seneca, R. M. Gummere

(Loeb Classical Library), E. I. Harris (the Executor of the late Dr. Harris), W. H. D. Rouse (Loeb Classical Library), and A. Stewart (Bell & Sons), Tacitus, A. J. Church and W. J. Brodribb (Macmillan & Co.), Sir W. Peterson (Loeb Classical Library), and G. G. Ramsay (John Murray), Terence J. Sargeaunt (Loeb Classical Library), Tibullus Cranston (Blackwood), Varro, Lloyd Storr Best (Bohn Library, Bell & Sons), Velleius Paterculus, in W. C. Summers's Silver Age of Latin Literature (Methuen & Co.), Virgil R. D. Blackmore (Sampson Low), Sir Charles Bowen (John Murray), C. S. Calverley (Bell & Sons), J. E. Flecker (Martin Secker), William Morris (Trustees of the late William Morris), T. S. Roysds (Dent & Sons) and A. S. Way (A. S. Way and Macmillan & Co.)

For the selection of the illustrations we are indebted to Mr. John Johnson, Printer to the University.

CONTENTS

	PAGE
INTRODUCTION, by Cyril Bailey	I

PART I

VERSE

EPIC, by A. N. Bryan-Brown	16
LYRICS AND OCCASIONAL VERSE, by J. Bell	61
DIDACTIC POETRY, by C. Bailey	91
ELEGIAC, by A. N. Bryan-Brown	129
DRAMA, by J. G. Barrington-Ward	166
BUCOLIC, by M. Platnauer	212

PART II

VERSE AND PROSE

STORY-TELLING AND THE NOVEL, by T. F. Higham	240
SATIRE, by T. F. Higham	281
LETTER-WRITING, by J. Bell	320
LITERARY CRITICISM, by J. G. Barrington-Ward	353

PART III

PROSE

HISTORY, by M. Platnauer	392
ORATORY, by C. Bailey	441
PHILOSOPHY, by C. Bailey	465
SCIENCE, by H. E. Butler and Charles Singer	485

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS

Statue of a Roman Magistrate (Sion House)	Frontispiece
An Italian Hill Town, Capistrello. Photograph by Mr. R. Gardner	facing p. 1
The Bay of Naples from the legendary site of Virgil's Tomb. Photograph by Mr. W. A. Casson	22
View of Mount Etna from the north. Photograph by Mr. R. Gardner	30
The Altar of Turnus and Jaturna. Photograph by Mr. Percival Hart	52
The 'Grotto of Catullus' at Sirmio on the shores of Lake Garda. Photograph by Mr. G. Lavo	66
View from the top of Mount Soracte looking towards S. Oreste. Photograph by Mr. R. Gardner	76
'Earth must thou leave.' The same note of Roman depression on a Mosaic in Rome. Photograph by P. E. Chauffourier, Roma	80
'And on the slumbering hills look down at home.' View at Tivoli where Horace is said to have had a villa	88
The 'Survival of the Fittest.' Pompeian wall painting	108
Olives silvering on the roadside near Assisi. Photograph by Mr. Percival Hart	112
Oxen ploughing (between Montefalco and Foligno). Photograph by Mr. Percival Hart	114
A scene on the stage from a Vatican MS. of Terence (ninth century), Adelphoe II. 264-6. Photograph Sansaini	192
The ground plan of the early theatre at Bovianum Vetus. Photograph by Mr. R. Gardner	200
The ruins (very nearly complete) of the great theatre of Aspendus in Asia Minor. Photograph by Dr. D. G. Hogarth	200
'The Sicilian Hills.' View near Girgenti in Sicily. Photograph by Mr. R. Gardner	214
On the hills over Tivoli. Photograph by Mr. R. Gardner	230
The Rape of Europa. From a wall painting at Pompeii. Photograph, Anderson	242
The back of the Stage from a sepulchral relief in the Brit. Mus.	268
A relief showing either a Public Recitation or an Early Christian Sermon. Museo Civico, Milan	268
'The Greeks and Romans were not jealous of strange gods.' A Roman relief of Priests and Priestesses of Isis. Photograph Sansaini	278

The hills around Horace's Sabine Farm	Photograph by Mr R. Gardner	facing p 794
A Latin Papyrus letter of the second century A D	Oxyrhynchus Papyrus No XXII	Reproduced by the kind permission of the Egypt Exploration Society
		320
A Roman Country House	Pompeian wall painting	344
A later persecution of the Christians	A Greek affidavit of recantation and heathen worship dated A D 50	By permission of the John Rylands Library of Manchester
		348
The Study	In this relief a Greek physician is reading a work which is in nine rolls	Eight are arranged in a pyramid in the Armarium and he is holding the ninth in his hand
		370
Pompey from a denarius struck about 37 B C	by a supporter of his son Sextus Pompeius	398
On the reverse a Roman Galley	The man who struck the coin Q Nasidius was probably brother of L Nasidius	Both obverse and reverse are enlarged 398
Syracuse Harbour	Photograph by Mr R Gardner	410
Subterranean defending passage under the fort Euryalus	Syracuse built at the end of the fifth century B C after the Athenian Expedition	Photograph by Mr Percival Hart
		412
The German danger in the North.	On the left is a coin of the reign of Augustus stamped VAR for Varus the commander whose legions were annihilated in Germany	on the right the back and front of a coin commemorating a triumph over the Germans and the recovery of the standards of Varus under Germanicus
		424
A German in Claudius's squadron	From a tomb	424
Head of Tiberius	Wilton House	428
A School of Acting from a sarcophagus relief.	Photograph R Mosconi	442
Cicero's country	Modern Arpinum in the middle distance and in the foreground an ancient polygonal wall	Photograph by Mr R. Gardner
		444
A Greek inscription of the third century A D	set up in Antinoë in Upper Egypt in honour of a Platonic philosopher who had the privilege of free sustenance in the Museum at Alexandria.	By permission of the Egypt Exploration Society
		48
Scenes from a Professor's class room at Alexandria	From a sarcophagus in Berlin	48
Reconstruction of Caesar's bridge over the Rhine	in the Musée de Saint Germain-en Laye	Photograph Neurdein et Calmann Lévy réunis
		502

An Italian Hill Town, Capri-hills in property Mr. R. M. C. C.

INTRODUCTION

IF we wish to understand an ancient people—or, indeed any foreign people—it is necessary besides knowing something of their history, of their habits and of the country in which they lived to make acquaintance with their mind to know what were their interests and their mode of thought, their problems and their attitude towards them. Foreign travel can help us to such a knowledge of contemporary nations, but when we are studying an ancient people the one source is their literature. A nation which has passed away, but has left a literature behind it, can be infinitely better known to the modern world than one which has left none, and this is why among the ancient civilized peoples we can form a far truer appreciation of the Greeks for instance, or the Romans or the Hebrews, than we can of the Egyptians or the Persians or the Babylonians. For we have still extant a great wealth of writings, both in prose and verse which reveal to us their thought and their imagination.

This book is an attempt to present to English readers some picture of the Mind of Rome. We have advisedly chosen the word 'Mind', because we think it is the most characteristic description of the content of Roman literature. Had we been dealing with Greece, we might perhaps have spoken of its 'Spirit', for though there is indeed more hard thinking in the philosophic writing of Greece than there ever was in Rome, yet Greek literature as a whole has a buoyancy and freshness of imagination which seem always to lift it into the world of spirit. But with the exception of one or two of their poets Catullus, perhaps, and in a more restrained way Virgil, Rome had little of this quality of spirit. The Romans were always a practical rather than an imaginative people—they thought more of the next step to be taken than of the ultimate ideal. And so in their literature we seem to see their writers setting themselves deliberately to a problem. Something has to be done and they think out the best way to do it: the result may be a piece of oratory which sweeps us away or a poem instinct with beauty, yet we feel it to have been the outcome of an exercise of mind rather than a spontaneous outburst of the spirit.

There are indeed two special reasons why this was so. In the first place, Roman literature was not a spontaneous native growth. If we attempt to probe far back into the earlier history of the Italian peoples we seem to find traces of rough dramatic performances and, more doubtfully, of the composition and singing of ballads; public business too had clearly produced a kind of rugged oratory. But we can actually date the beginning of the literature of Rome from the time of the Punic Wars, when Rome, having made herself master of Italy, had come into contact with other nations and especially with Greece. We can be more exact than that and can say that it began in the year 240 B.C. when the Greek freedman schoolmaster, Livius Andronicus, translated for his pupils the Odyssey and some Greek plays. These became the models for further attempts in drama and epic and then one by one came imitations of other forms of Greek literature. And oddly enough, Roman writers were not only conscious of this dependence on Greek originals, but they gloried in it. A patriotic writer or two attempted to write dramas on Roman subjects, but they were a failure, and when Rome did invent a new form of writing in Satire she did not feel quite comfortable about it and was at pains to show that it was really the legitimate successor of the old Attic Comedy of Aristophanes and his contemporaries. Otherwise, poets were careful to point to their Greek originals: Horace is always telling us that he is introducing Sappho or Alcaeus or Pindar to Rome, Propertius looks to the Alexandrines, Callimachus and Philetas, and even before the publication of the Aeneid Virgil's friends proclaimed it as 'something greater than the Iliad'. This imitation of Greek models and dependence on Greek originals of itself produces a conscious effort about Latin literature which gives it essentially an intellectual quality of 'mund'.

The second reason for this intellectual character of Roman literature is closely connected with the first. Not only was it not a product of the people, but it was never really popular, rather it was the possession of the educated few—the few who knew Greek—and could therefore appreciate the literature of Rome as an outcome of the Greek. If we look at Roman poetry, we find that the very technical basis of it all, scansion by the quantity of syllables, went against the natural tendency of the Latin language, which was to scan by stress or accent. The earlier dramatists who wished their works to have a popular vogue, were at pains to secure that stress and quantity should coincide, but in other forms of poetry no such attempt was made and it must always have sounded unnatural to the vulgar. Indeed we have good reason to believe that the people all the while in their own rough songs preserved the old scansion by accent, and when in the late Empire literature declined it burst out again in the popular songs and later in the Christian hymns. Poetry, based on Greek models, was never popular and was the preserve of the cultured minority. And this is true too even of prose. Historians had their Greek models, and orators not only imitated the styles of Greek predecessors, but, as we have but lately learnt in the case of Cicero, even employed formal quantitative rhythms derived from Greek sources. Cicero in his public speeches no doubt meant to persuade the listening mob, but he also meant to win applause from the learned for the correctness and beauty of his cadences.

But if these considerations lead us to ascribe to Roman literature the quality of 'mund' rather than 'spirit', they must not be held to be derogatory to its greatness. For it was never a merely slavish imitation of Greek—from the first it developed its own distinctive Roman qualities, and those the qualities shown in the Roman people themselves in their gradual growth to greatness and the expansion of their empire. Rome had a hard fight to win her way, first with the other peoples of Italy and then with surrounding nations in an ever-spreading circumference, Greece and Carthage, Gaul, Spain, Germany, Egypt, Asia Minor and Syria. And the qualities which this struggle engendered were mainly two, first manliness (virtus), primarily the valour of the soldier and then the virility of the people as a whole, and secondly what we may call 'dignity' (gravitas), at first perhaps the quality of the general or statesman, who is not unduly upset by reverses, and then permeating among the people as a sense of their own worth. And with the growing success of the Roman arms came a growing realization of the greatness of Rome, producing a fine patriotism not only in the Romans themselves, but also—and this was really the secret of Rome's success as a conqueror—in the peoples who from time to time became included in the Empire, the 'allies' (socii) as the Romans always called them. Now these qualities are always visible in Roman literature, at any rate till the days of decline. Patriotism—not a braggart, self-exalting patriotism, but a just sense of Rome's mission in the world, to spread peace through war—is not only the keynote, as one might expect, of history and oratory and epic, but shows itself too in drama and even in lyric and didactic poetry, where we should less expect it. Virility too and dignity are marked characteristics. Even when Alexandrinism might have spread effeminacy, Rome held out against it, and when, under the Empire, society fell into weak and luxurious ways, literature in the satirists raised its voice in protest. Dignity was inherent in the language; the very changes which Roman poets made in the metres and rhythms of Greece are due to the natural 'weightiness' of Latin, which, though it never degenerated into pomposity, is always the heart of Roman history and oratory.

There are two other characteristics of Roman literature which may rightly be associated with the character of the people. One of these is a certain practical wisdom, which shows itself sometimes as a kind of shrewdness. The Roman was deeply interested in the practical questions of life and conduct: drama, and especially comedy, is full of proverbial maxims for action and we can sometimes almost hear the applause as they were enunciated on the stage, and when in due course Rome borrowed philosophy from the Greeks it was almost entirely ethics with which she concerned herself. We feel this strain running all through her literature sometimes it appears as an almost offensive conscious rectitude, more often as a genuine appreciation of real goodness. And in its lighter mood it shows as the shrewdness which made the Roman a good 'business man'. It is to this quality that we must attribute the birth of satire: the moral wisdom produces its reflexion and criticism, and the shrewdness gives it that touch of irony which is its salt. Yet even in satire emerges too the second characteristic, which we may take perhaps to be the product of Rome's success, a geniality and kindness which, while it sees faults, is ready to understand and condone them: which has a welcome for the stranger, and a sense, if not of real wit, yet of pervading humour. It was this quality which in Rome's conquests taught her to respect the customs and beliefs of the conquered: it is this quality which gives her literature a kind of good-hearted benevolence that attracts and holds us. It is most noticeable in Plautus, Horace, and Seneca in their different generations, but it shines out elsewhere as well.

It might be thought that the sense of beauty was wholly the gift of Greece to Rome. To some extent this is true. The beauty of sculpture and architecture and painting came to Rome directly or indirectly from Greek sources: but we are learning more and more to see how Rome developed these arts on her own lines.¹ And so it was with the beauty of literature. In the early period of Naevius and Ennius there is no doubt, but little sense of beauty, either in form or in content, but as Rome came to know her Greek models more closely and to think out the full Roman form of them so imperceptibly came her own peculiar sense of beauty. We may perhaps notice three characteristics. Firstly, on the technical side the sense of form was no doubt to a large extent the second century B.C. the comedian Terence was an African slave in the age of Nero Spain gave Rome the Senecas and Lucan and later an African Apuleius again took up the succession. This is of course the direct outcome of Rome's policy of welding and assimilation after conquest. As the name of the Roman people came to have an ever widening application so Roman literature is not the literature of the city only but of the empire.

¹ See the article on Art and Architecture by W. G. Rushforth in the Legacy of Rome.

The plan of this book is to deal with the literature of Rome in its various departments showing the gradual development of each and the phases which it went through. In this way it is easiest to obtain a conception of the wide range of the Roman writers and to compare one with another within the limits of the same field. But it has its disadvantages. The same author will appear in more than one department. Cicero for instance under Oratory, Philosophy and Letter writing. Virgil under Epic Didactic and Pastoral, so that if it is desired to gain a notion of the complete works of a single writer cross references must be followed up. Moreover the different departments run historically in vertical columns and are traced out like so many lines of longitude. If we wish to get an idea of the historical development of Roman literature as a whole we need to see it also horizontally as it were along its lines of latitude. For this purpose it would probably be well to read some short history of Latin literature as an accompaniment to this volume.¹ But as an assistance it may be well to give here a very brief sketch of the main lines of development.

The history of Roman literature may roughly be divided into four periods. (1) The earlier Republic. (2) The last century of the Republic. (3) The Augustan Age. (4) The Silver Age of the Empire from Augustus to Domitian.

1. The early period dates as we have seen from the attempt of Livius Andronicus about the middle of the third century B.C. to introduce Greek literature to Rome in translations. But its true characteristic was an attempt to make Latin literature essentially Roman in tone and really popular. Thus the two outstanding departments in this period are epic and drama. Nævius and Ennius tried to write Roman epic, telling Roman stories and Roman history in plain straightforward verse without ornament, except alliteration and assonance, so that it might be comprehended of the people. Similarly drama was written to be performed. Tragedy was perhaps never a popular success; the attempt to write tragedies on Roman subjects, made by Nævius, Pacuvius, and Accius, failed because Rome had so few legends except those of Aeneas and Romulus and the facts of her history did not really lend themselves to drama. The tragedies on Greek subjects, written by the same authors and by Ennius, though containing much fine work, made no real popular appeal, and, when in later times they were revived, it was mostly for the sake of allusions to contemporary politics which could be squeezed out of them. Comedy had a greater success, and the plays of Plautus, derived from Greek originals, yet overlaid with Roman thought and allusions and containing a large element of boisterous fun, undoubtedly had for a time a real following. To this earliest period too we may ascribe the beginnings of prose-literature, the elder Cato, the opponent of Greek learning, standing at the head of the list of Roman orators, and also in his great book on Origines setting the example of antiquarian research. History too made its beginnings in the writers whom Livy took as his authorities, though it is notable that several of them preferred to write in Greek.

¹ Dr J. W. Mackail's Latin Literature or in a smaller compass Professor J. Wight Duff's Writers of Rome may be specially recommended.

2. The second period—that of the last century of the Republic—may be subdivided into two, (a) the period of the Scipionic circle (130–120 B. C.) and (b) the great Republican period of the contemporaries of Caesar and Cicero. The characteristic of the first period is the realization that Roman literature can never be really popular and must be written for the educated: this is accompanied, as one might expect, by a growing sense of form based on a renewed study of the best Greek models. The Scipionic circle (i. e. the friends of the younger Scipio) was in fact a small literary coterie, who devoted themselves to the study of literature and philosophy. Their chief philosopher—Panaetius—has left nothing, but profoundly influenced later thought. Terence, the African slave, aided it was said, by Scipio himself, wrote a series of comedies, which, though models of pure Latin diction and marked by subtle study of character are lacking in the force and dramatic power of Plautus. his work marks the end of drama as a living art in Rome. Lucilius, following on Ennius, developed Satire and gave it its sting of criticism and irony, thus starting the tradition which was to be followed by Horace, Persius, and Juvenal and in the modern world by Pope, Dryden, Swift and Dr. Johnson. Meanwhile the stirring political events of the time had given a spur to Oratory, and Caius Gracchus, although we have but little of him left, was a model whom Cicero greatly admired, and later Crassus and Antonius, Cicero's teachers, further developed the art. (b) There is a lull during the Civil Wars of Marius and Sulla, marked however by the introduction of the 'occasional' elegiac poem by Q. Valerius Catullus and others. Then from 70 B.C. onwards comes the great epoch of literary activity, which has always disputed for supremacy with the succeeding age of Augustus. In poetry Alexandrinism in an exaggerated form vitiated many of the lesser writers but two great poets stand out, Catullus with a freshness and vigour of feeling which remains without parallel in Latin, and Lucretius, whose deep earnestness and vivid imagination enabled him to accomplish the almost impossible task of setting out a system of philosophy in poetry of the highest quality. In prose history is represented by the Commentaries of Caesar—a model of clear style and narrative—and by the rather more affected work of Sallust, who writes in a conscious style with an intentional political bias. To these may be added the less important biographies written by Cornelius Nepos. In oratory we have the great names of Hortensius, whose speeches unfortunately do not survive, and of Cicero, who set the style for oratory which has influenced all subsequent ages in Europe. Cicero has left us the first extant attempt at the writing of philosophy and literary criticism in Latin, and an invaluable collection of genuine and spontaneous letters. Hardly less important, though but little survives, were the antiquarian and scientific researches of Marcus Terentius Varro who also developed the Menippean satire, a medley of prose and verse. It is altogether an amazing period and its influence on the literature of the world has been immense.

3. The Augustan age, though continuous in time with the Republican period, is markedly different in character. A long period of civil dissension had been followed by a time of peace, or at least of pacification: the independence of the Republic was succeeded by the rule of one man, and politics ceased to have a burning interest. Augustus was himself genuinely interested in literature and believed that the poets could help him in making a new start. Consequently with the help of his supporter, Mæcenas, he gathered round him a brilliant circle of court-poets, all in a greater or less degree subservient to him, but free enough to express in their writings their own characters and outlook on life. Of these the greatest is of course Virgil: his three main works, the Eclogues, pastoral poems in the manner of Theocritus, the Georgics, a poem on agriculture in which he has embodied his love of the country and country-life, and the Aeneid, the epic in which he has summed up the greatness of Rome, will always stand out as the high-water mark of Latin poetry. Horace, a less deep personality, showed his versatility in Satires and Epistles, in which he discourses genially on moral and social topics, and in the Odes and Epodes, in which he gave its own peculiar form to the Latin lyric. Belonging to the same circle are Propertius, the writer of amorous elegiac, more under the influence of Alexandria, and another elegiac poet, Tibullus, whose verse is also amatory in character, but is marked by a love of country life second only to Virgil's. More detached from the court circle, and indeed in opposition to it after his exile by Augustus, is Ovid, the most voluminous of Roman poets, who ranged from the semi-ironic mythology of the Metamorphosis through the anti-quarianism of the Fast to the wearisome lamentations of the poems of his exile a prolific genius who disputes with Herodotus the claim to be the greatest story teller of antiquity Well below these poets comes the rather tedious astronomer Manius who carried on the tradition of didactic poetry

The Augustan age was essentially an age of poets. With the decline of politics oratory fell into decay and history is represented only by the one outstanding figure of Livy His colossal undertaking of writing the history of Rome down to his own times is unique and even though we may never recover it all enough remains for us to realize his great qualities The history is in reality a vast panegyric of Rome but his patriotism has always restraint and moderation In a different field we have in the Augustan age the architectural and engineering treatise of Vitruvius

4 The Silver Age (contrasted with the Golden Age which includes periods 2 and 3) was a long period of gradual decline on the whole but with occasional outbursts of vigour lasting for about 100 years from the death of Augustus in A.D. 14 till the reign of Hadrian Public life under the emperors was becoming more and more of a formality and with the ever increasing prosperity and luxury of the capital vitality was passing from Rome to the provinces A fatal influence too was exercised by the formal training in rhetoric which was undergone by all young men of the educated classes and which tended to substitute cleverness and epigram for naturalness and genuine feeling In this period again we may distinguish two lines of special activity the first under the emperor Nero (54-69 A.D.) and the second under the emperors of the end of the century Vespasian Titus Domitian and Hadrian

To the first period though he is in fact a little before it belongs Phaedrus who wrote fables in verse after the manner of Aesop but with a touch of irony which has sometimes caused him to be put in the succession of the satirists A more genuine satiric poet is the young Persius who set out his Stoic musings in crabbed and unattractive verse. In this period too prose satire comes once more to the fore: Petronius, half-satirist, half-novelist, writing in prose with an occasional interruption of verse, carries on the tradition set by Varro, while Seneca, in his brief lampoon on the death of the emperor Claudius known as the Pumpkinification, writes bitterly, but without much humour. Lucan, a young Spaniard, essays historical epic once more in the Pharsalia, an account of the wars of Pompey and Caesar, much vitiated by rhetoric, but also profoundly influenced by Virgil. The principal prose writer of this period is undoubtedly Seneca, a Spanish kinsman of Lucan and tutor of the emperor Nero, who besides touching on science in his Natural Questions wrote a large number of treatises and a vast series of moral Letters, setting out in a genial and very unmethodical manner the watered-down Stoicism which was then in vogue. We may add the names of Pomponius Mela, the geographer, and Celsus, the writer on medicine, both of whom belong to this generation.

In the later imperial period we have a more prolific output, but, with one or two exceptions, it is not high in quality. The second-rate poets showed a tendency to return to epic: Valerius Flaccus wrote a rather turgid poem on the Argonauts, not however devoid of feeling and power, Statius a tedious narrative called the Thebais, which at times shows a real gift of description, and Silius Italicus, coming back again to the historical epic, an immense work on the Punic wars, of which the less said the better. Statius also wrote a book of Silvae, occasional poems, which, but for two or three attractive pieces, have all the worst faults both of Alexandrinism and of adulation. Far more important was the satire of Juvenal, who, even though his sincerity has sometimes been doubted, has a master-hand and has exercised a lasting influence. With him may be grouped Martial, whose epigrams on a variety of subjects often have a satiric sting. In prose the record is more noteworthy: Quintilian in his long work on the Training of an Orator has not only given us an interesting discussion of the prevailing education, but much literary criticism, very characteristic of the Roman mind. Pliny the Elder in his vast work on Natural History collected with immense pains the rather desultory scientific knowledge of his day his nephew Pliny the Younger wrote a series of polished letters manifestly intended for publication but showing a kindly and cultured character But by far the greatest name of the period is that of Tacitus who besides an interesting Dialogue on Orators an early work in the Ciceronian manner and two gems of condensation a monograph on Germany and a biography of his father in law Agricola conceived and in large part executed the vast task of a history of the empire from Augustus to his own day He used the rhetorical manner of his day not to corrupt an existing style but to develop an entirely novel style of history terse mordant epigrammatic sometimes almost telegraphic which in his hands is magnificently successful but has been the despair of all imitators and translators

Latin literature lingered on gradually declining but with an occasional flicker such as the miscellaneous writings of Apuleius (c. A.D. 160) till it was merged in the Middle Ages But the student who has followed it up to Tacitus will have made the acquaintance of all that is worth knowing

EPIC

IN epic poetry Rome gives us much of her best, and also some of her worst. More persistent throughout Rome's literary history than any other form of poetry, epic rises gradually to a great climax—for the Aeneid must always remain one of the greatest poems of the world—and then sinks away, corrupted by the characteristic faults of the imperial decadence. Roman epic till the last stage of its decline is always typically Roman: though like other branches of Latin literature it was founded on Greek models, it early developed the strong tone of patriotism which marked it in its greatness and also to some degree in its decay. If we are to look anywhere for the 'mind of Rome' it must be in Virgil. In the modern world, too, Roman epic has produced great offspring, for without the Aeneid neither Dante's Divine Comedy nor Milton's Paradise Lost, divergent as they are from one another, could have come into being.

Narrative poetry in some form or other seems a natural and almost inevitable outgrowth in any nation, and there is reason to believe that some kind of ballad singing may have been developed in Rome unaided by external influences. Catò the elder, according to Cicero, knew of songs of the deeds of heroes which were sung at banquets. Niebuhr, the historian, built on this a theory of the existence of a considerable ballad literature in early Rome to which, he believed, were due the stories of the hero kings which we find as the legendary prelude to Roman history: it was the spirit of these supposed ballads which Macaulay tried to reproduce in the 'Lays of Ancient Rome'. Their belief may have been exaggerated, but it is clear that when Rome grasped the idea of epic on a larger scale she was quick to seize it: there was at least a predisposition to celebrate the deeds of heroes in poetry.

Greece had as the background of her poetry the great epics of Homer, which throughout her history never lost their charm and their power: they remained always the monumental achievement on which the Greek boy was educated and to which he turned almost as to his Bible. And so when in 240 B. C. the Greek freed-man Livius Andronicus, more schoolmaster than poet, wished to introduce Roman 'boys to the joys of Greek literature 'in translations', he turned naturally to the Odyssey. He did not attempt to introduce into Latin the Homeric hexameter, but used instead the rough Italian 'Saturnian' metre, scanned in all probability not by quantity but by accent, and producing an effect something like that of our nursery rhyme, 'The queen was in the parlour, eating bread and honey'. There are only scattered lines of his effort remaining and a rather pale reflex of the Odyssey they appear, but they represent the very beginnings of Latin literature, the first steps on the road which was to lead to Virgil's Aeneid.

It was not long before the hunt was taken. CNAEUS NAEVIUS (c. 270-199 B.C.¹) was determined to make a Latin literature which should be independent of Greek. He wrote plays on Roman subjects and also set out to compose an epic account of the 'Punic War', in which he himself had served. His choice of theme was characteristic, and so is the plodding methodical manner in which he set about it. About one hundred lines of the poem are left to us, and they are enough to enable us to form some judgement on his style. We may try to give something of the effect of his lines in the rough nursery metre. Sometimes his verse is the baldest narrative: thus

Marcus Valerius the consul, marches out to forage
With more than half his army

Or again

The army of the Romans

Crosses over to Malta, ravages the island
Burns and lays waste everything, settles the foemen's business

Note the almost slangy phrase with which this ends, hardly worth the dignity of epic. But prefixed to this matter-of-fact account of the war is a story, precious to us because here for the first time in Latin literature we meet the Aeneas legend. Here is a glimpse of the flight from Troy:

Aeneas, wife and mother

Fled the town at midnight with veils around their heads
Weeping both at going, shedding tears of sorrow

Later on we have a fragment which may, as some think, refer to the meeting with Dido:

Wise and kindly questions, asking how Aeneas
Quitted burning Troy

¹ See pp. 171 ff.

Searching for thee, dear sister, and thy steps ;
 Nor could I grasp thee in my dream , no path
 Gave surety to my feet Then suddenly
 Our father seemed to call me with a cry
 " Daughter, thou must bear pains, yet afterwards
 From out the river shall thy fortune turn "
 So spake our father, sister, and was gone
 Nor gave himself more to my longing sight
 Though oft I stretched my hands to heaven's blue dome,
 Weeping and calling him with yearning voice
 So scarce the dream did leave my fever'd heart

This is a great advance on Naevius and shows some quality of real poetic narrative at the same time it has its roughnesses, not easily reproduced in translation, in the use of prosaic and awkward words and a rather naive alliteration In a short passage describing the lamentation of Romulus' followers at his death there is deep feeling

STRONG hearts are seized with sorrow, ' Romulus,
 O Romulus divine,' mourns one to other,
 ' Strong guardian to our land Heaven gat in thee
 O sire, o father, offspring of the gods,
 Thou leddest us forth into the coasts of light '

As the poet left legend and approached his own times, his treatment of events naturally grew more detailed and more matter-of-fact He dealt at some length with Rome's war with Pyrrhus, King of Epirus (281-275 B C) and Cicero has quoted with admiration the chivalrous reply which Ennius represents the Greek king as giving to a proposal by the Roman general to ransom prisoners

I ASK not gold ye shall not pay me price
 Not huckstering war, but waging war like men,
 With steel not gold we'll both decide our fate
 Whether Dame Fortune will that I prevail
 Or you, or whate'er else her judgement be,
 By valour make we trial Mark me well

Those men whose valour by the battle's fortune
 Was spared, their freedom shall by me be spared.
 'Tis my resolve ; take them : I give them freely ;
 And may the great gods grant thereto their grace.

Ennius then described the Punic wars, traversing the same ground as Naevius, but giving his theme, we may be sure, a greater poetic value. We may quote from the account of the Second Punic War (218-201 B. C.) a famous description of the confidential friend of the general Servilius Geminus ; it is said to be a portrait of the poet himself in his relations with Marcus Fulvius Nobilior, who subdued Aetolia in 189 B. C.

HE called his friend, with whom he loved to share
 Table and talk and all affairs, at ease,
 Worn out by some long day in council spent
 And grave debate on high affairs of state
 In market-place or sacred senate-house.
 Him he could frankly tell things great and small,
 And jest and pour out words of good or ill
 Just as he would, sure of his trust in one
 Wise to conceal or tell the words he heard.
 Many their joys alone, or with the crowd ;
 No thoughts could make him fickle or malicious,
 Or warp his mind to crime ; learned and loyal,
 Gentle and eloquent, content and happy,
 Shrewd, seasonable in word, apt, reticent,
 With many a buried treasure of the past,
 Laws of old ancestors, of gods and men,
 Which taught him to keep customs new and old.

It is possible perhaps from these extracts to realize the dignity and depth which caused Ennius to be regarded as the ' father of Roman poetry ', and at more than one period later on made men turn back from the artificialities of their contemporaries to his simpler and weightier lines. His very ruggedness was Roman and appealed to their national consciousness : he was indeed, as Ovid described him, ' Great in his Genius, in his Art uncouth.' After Ennius there is a long gap in the history of Roman epic.

It does not seem to have appealed to the strict Hellenism of the circle of literary men which gathered round the younger Scipio (c. 130 B.C.), and in the last century of the Republic Roman poets were largely under the domination of Alexandrinism, which preferred the short gem like type of poem to the long sustained effort, 'a big book is a big bore,' said one of Alexandria's leading critics. Yet, when epic appears again it is clear that Alexandrinism had left its mark on it, and we cannot therefore exclude from the history of epic the typically Alexandrine poem of 408 lines which was written by CATULLUS (see pp. 62 ff. 130 ff.) on the Marriage of Peleus and Thetis. It has all the marks of its kind, artificiality, preciousness, obtruded mythological learning, and yet with it a really Greek sense of form and beauty, which was the lasting gift of Alexandrinism. We may quote a passage from the translation of Sir William Marris. On the coverlet of the marriage bed is embroidered the scene of Ariadne's desertion by Theseus, whom she had aided against the Minotaur, a monster kept by her father in the Labyrinth.

WHY leave the earlier subject of my verse,
 Further to tell how from her sire she passed
 And clinging sister, and her mother last,
 Who o'er her daughter wildly laughed and mourned,
 And from them all to her dear Theseus turned?
 How sped the boat to Dia's foamy shores
 And how, as sunk in slumber soft she lay,
 Faithless he left her there and stole away?
 Often they say, she passionately sent
 Forth from her very heart a piercing shriek,
 Then would she sadly climb the broken peak
 To range her gaze over the vast extent
 Of waves, and then would bare her to the knee,
 And run to meet the ripples of the sea
 And thus poured out her final sad lament
 While 'mid her tears the cold sobs came and went
 What! hast thou borne me from my father's house
 And left me thus forlorn beside the seas?
 False Theseus! O how false! to leave me thus,

Those men whose valour by the battle's fortune
 Was spared, their freedom shall by me be spared.
 'Tis my resolve ; take them : I give them freely ;
 And may the great gods grant thereto their grace.

Ennius then described the Punic wars, traversing the same ground as Naevius, but giving his theme, we may be sure, a greater poetic value. We may quote from the account of the Second Punic War (218-201 B. C.) a famous description of the confidential friend of the general Servilius Geminus ; it is said to be a portrait of the poet himself in his relations with Marcus Fulvius Nobilior, who subdued Aetolia in 189 B. C.

HE called his friend, with whom he loved to share
 Table and talk and all affairs, at ease,
 Worn out by some long day in council spent
 And grave debate on high affairs of state
 In market-place or sacred senate-house.
 Him he could frankly tell things great and small,
 And jest and pour out words of good or ill
 Just as he would, sure of his trust in one
 Wise to conceal or tell the words he heard.
 Many their joys alone, or with the crowd ;
 No thoughts could make him fickle or malicious,
 Or warp his mind to crime ; learned and loyal,
 Gentle and eloquent, content and happy,
 Shrewd, seasonable in word, apt, reticent,
 With many a buried treasure of the past,
 Laws of old ancestors, of gods and men,
 Which taught him to keep customs new and old.

It is possible perhaps from these extracts to realize the dignity and depth which caused Ennius to be regarded as the ' father of Roman poetry ', and at more than one period later on made men turn back from the artificialities of their contemporaries to his simpler and weightier lines. His very ruggedness was Roman and appealed to their national consciousness : he was indeed, as Ovid described him, ' Great in his Genius, in his Art uncouth.' After Ennius there is a long gap in the history of Roman epic.

It does not seem to have appealed to the strict Hellenism of the circle of literary men which gathered round the younger Scipio (c. 130 B.C.), and in the last century of the Republic Roman poets were largely under the domination of Alexandrinism, which preferred the short gem-like type of poem to the long sustained effort, 'a big book is a big bore,' said one of Alexandria's leading critics. Yet, when epic appears again it is clear that Alexandrinism had left its mark on it, and we cannot therefore exclude from the history of epic the typically Alexandrine poem of 408 lines which was written by CATULLUS (see pp. 62 ff. 130 ff.) on the Marriage of Peleus and Thetis. It has all the marks of its kind: artificiality, preciousness, obtruded mythological learning; and yet with it a really Greek sense of form and beauty, which was the lasting gift of Alexandrinism. We may quote a passage from the translation of Sir William Marns. On the coverlet of the marriage bed is embroidered the scene of Ariadne's desertion by Theseus, whom she had aided against the Minotaur, a monster kept by her father in the Labyrinth.

WHY leave the earlier subject of my verse,
Further to tell how from her sire she passed
And clinging sister and her mother last,
Who o'er her daughter wildly laughed and mourned,
And from them all to her dear Theseus turned?
How sped the boat to Dia's foamy shores
And how, as sunk in slumber soft she lay,
Faithless he left her there and stole away?
Often they say she passionately sent
Forth from her very heart a piercing shriek,
Then would she sadly climb the broken peak
To range her gaze over the vast extent
Of waves, and then would bare her to the knee,
And run to meet the ripples of the sea
And thus poured out her final sad lament
While 'mid her tears the cold sobs came and went
What! hast thou borne me from my father's house
And left me thus forlorn beside the seas?
False Theseus! O how false! to leave me thus,

Ennius then described the Punic wars, traversing the same ground as Naevius, but giving his theme, we may be sure, a greater poetic value. We may quote from the account of the Second Punic War (218-201 B. C.) a famous description of the confidential friend of the general Servilius Geminus; it is said to be a portrait of the poet himself in his relations with Marcus Fulvius Nobilior, who subdued Aetolia in 180 B. C.

HE called his friend, with whom he loved to share
 Table and talk and all affairs, at ease,
 Worn out by some long day in council spent
 And grave debate on high affairs of state
 In market-place or sacred senate-house.
 Him he could frankly tell things great and small,
 And jest and pour out words of good or ill
 Just as he would, sure of his trust in one
 Wise to conceal or tell the words he heard.
 Many their joys alone, or with the crowd,
 No thoughts could make him fickle or malicious,
 Or warp his mind to crime. learned and loyal,
 Gentle and eloquent, content and happy,
 Shrewd, seasonable in word, apt, reticent,
 With many a buried treasure of the past,
 Laws of old ancestors, of gods and men,
 Which taught him to keep customs new and old

It is possible perhaps from these extracts to realize the dignity and depth which caused Ennius to be regarded as the 'father of Roman poetry', and at more than one period later on made men turn back from the artificialities of their contemporaries to his simpler and weightier lines. His very ruggedness was Roman and appealed to their national consciousness: he was indeed, as Ovid described him, 'Great in his Genius, in his Art uncouth.'
 After Ennius there is a long gap in the history of Roman epic.

It does not seem to have appealed to the strict Hellenism of the circle of literary men which gathered round the younger Scipio (c. 130 B.C.), and in the last century of the Republic Roman poets were largely under the domination of Alexandrinism which preferred the short gem-like type of poem to the long sustained effort, 'a big book is a big bore,' said one of Alexandria's leading critics. Yet when epic appears again it is clear that Alexandrinism had left its mark on it, and we cannot therefore exclude from the history of epic the typically Alexandrine poem of 408 lines which was written by CATULLUS (see pp. 62 ff., 130 ff.) on the Marriage of Peleus and Thetis. It has all the marks of its kind, artificiality, preciousness, obtruded mythological learning, and yet with it a really Greek sense of form and beauty, which was the lasting gift of Alexandrinism. We may quote a passage from the translation of Sir William Marris. On the coverlet of the marriage bed is embroidered the scene of Ariadne's desertion by Theseus whom she had aided against the Minotaur, a monster kept by her father in the Labyrinth.

WHY leave the earlier subject of my verse,
Further to tell how from her sire she passed
And clinging sister, and her mother last,
Who o'er her daughter wildly laughed and mourned,
And from them all to her dear Theseus turned?
How sped the boat to Dia's foamy shores,
And how, as sunk in slumber soft she lay,
Faithless he left her there and stole away?
Often they say, she passionately sent
Forth from her very heart a piercing shriek,
Then would she sadly climb the broken peak
To range her gaze over the vast extent
Of waves and then would bare her to the knee,
And run to meet the ripples of the sea
And thus poured out her final sad lament
While mid her tears the cold sobs came and went
'What! hast thou borne me from my father's house
And left me thus forlorn beside the seas?
False Theseus O how false! to leave me thus,

Crackling of cordage, groaning masts resound ;
 Clouds snatch the daylight from the Trojan's eyes.
 Black Night sits brooding on the waves. All round
 Leaps the live thunder with delirious bound,
 And frequent flashes light the lurid air.
 All nature, big with instant ruin, frowned
 Destruction. Then Aeneas' limbs in fear
 Were loosened, and he groaned, and stretched his hands in prayer.
 'Thrice, four times blest, who, in their father's face,
 Fell by the walls of Ilion far away !
 O son of Tydeus, bravest of thy race,
 Why could not I have perished on that day
 Beneath thine arm, and poured this soul away,
 Far on the plains of Troy, where Hector brave
 Lay, pierced by fierce Aeacides ; where lay
 Giant Sarpedon, and swift Simois' wave
 Rolls heroes, helms, and shields, blent in one watery grave ?'
 (Aen. i. 81-100, tr. Fairfax Taylor.)

The storm drives the Trojans to the African coast, where Dido, fleeing from Tyre, has recently founded Carthage. The queen receives them kindly and Aeneas tells the tale of Troy's capture and his wanderings. We are reminded of Naevius.

'T was the time when the first slumber falls
 On suffering mortals, by the high gods' gift
 Then sweetliest stealing o'er them : lo ! in sleep
 Hector before mine eyes, all woe-begone,
 Seemed then to stand, and shower down floods of tears ;
 Torn by the dragging chariot, as of old,
 And black with blood-stained dust,—his swollen feet
 Pierced with the thong. Ah ! what a sight he was !
 How all unlike that Hector, who returned,
 Clad in Achilles' arms,¹ the spoils of war,
 Or fresh from hurling on the Danaan decks
 The fires of Phrygia ! now with dragged beard,

¹ Taken from Patroclus, to whom Achilles had lent them.

And hair blood-clotted, wearing all those wounds
 So thickly dealt him round his native walls !
 Weeping myself I first, methought, addressed
 The hero, and drew forth these sorrowing words
 " Light of the Dardan land, O staunchest hope
 Of Teucris's sons, say why this long delay ?
 Or from what borders, Hector, art thou come
 Much looked for ? is it thus that, wearied out
 With all the myriad slaughters of thy friends
 City and townsmen's ever-changing woes,
 Our eyes behold thee ? What unseemly cause
 Hath marred thy cloudless features ? or what mean
 These wounds I gaze on ? " Not a word spake he,
 Nor reched mine idle questioning, but groan
 On laboured groan from out his bosom's depth
 Upheaving, " Ah ! fly, goddess born " he said,
 " And snatch thee from the flames the foeman hath
 Our walls, and Troy from her proud summit sinks
 Enough to king and country hath been given
 If any hand could Pergamus have saved,
 Then mine had saved it Troy commits to thee
 Her worship and her household gods, these take
 As comrades of thy destinies, for these
 Seek out a mighty city thou at length
 Shalt rear thee, having roamed wide ocean o'er
 Such words he spake and in his hands bare forth
 The sacred fillets from the inmost shrine,
 And Vesta's might, and her undying fire.

 ' Meantime the walls grow one confused scene
 Of widespread anguish, and though far withdrawn
 My sire Anchises palace amid trees
 Lay sheltered ever louder and more loud
 Surges the din, swells out the alarm of war
 I start from sleep to the high roof top mount,
 And stand, all ear, to hearken as, when fire

Falls on the corn beneath the furious south,
Or ravening torrent from a mountain flood
Lays low the fields, lays low the laughing crops,
The oxen's labour, and drags forests down
Headlong, the hind from some tall craggy peak
Mute with amaze stands listening to the roar.
Then is the bare truth self-attested, then
The Danaan wiles unmask them; see e'en now
The house of Deiphobus a vast ruin yawns
O'ertopped by Vulcan! see his neighbour too
Ucalegon in flames! Sigeum's gulf
Reflects the blaze afar. Up goes to heaven
Shouting of men, and clarion's bray; distraught
I seize mine arms, though arms lack argument;
But my heart burns to mass a warrior-band,
And with my comrades hasten to the hold:
Frenzy and anger urge my headlong will,
And death methinks how comely, sword in hand!
 'But Panthus, from the Achæan darts escaped,
Panthus, the son of Othrys, see! and priest
Of Phoebus on the height, in his own hand
The sacred emblems of the vanquished gods,
And dragging his young grandchild after him,
Nigh at wits' end comes hurrying to my door.
"Panthus, how stands the fortune of the day?
What point of vantage seize we?" Scarce had I
Uttered the words when, groaning, he replies:
"The latest day, the inevitable hour,
Has dawned on Dardan land; we, Trojans once,
And Ilium, and the Teucrians' giant fame
Have been, and are not; Jove's remorseless will
From us to Argos hath borne all away;
Our town's a-flame; the Danaans lord it there.
Towering amidst the city-walls erect
The horse rains armed warriors! far and near

Sinon¹ with victor insolence spreads wide
 The conflagration Through the folding gates
 Some enter, myriads countless as e'er came
 From great Mycenae, some to bar our path
 With weapons have beset the narrow ways,
 A wall of steel blade edges flashing bare
 For death blow dight scarce seek the foremost guards
 To hold the gates against them, or maintain
 The blindfold conflict " At such words as these
 From Othrys' son and at the doom of heaven
 I rush into the midst of fire and fray,
 Where the grim Fury, where the battle-din
 Me summons, and the shouts uptossed to heaven '

(Aen ii 268-338, tr Rhoades)

This Second Book is full of a sense of mystery and impending doom and one of the most eerie passages is that in which Aeneas sees Helen 'common fiend of Troy and her own country'—and thinking to slay her is withheld by the appearance of Venus his goddess mother

S UDDEN to my sight is borne,
 Never till now so dazzling to behold,
 And in pure radiance beaming through the night,
 My gentle mother—goddess undisguised—
 Such and so stately as her form appears
 To sons of heaven she held me by the hand,
 And thus moreover spake with rosy lips
 " Son, what fierce anguish in thy bosom stirs
 Ungovernable wrath ? why ragest thou ?
 Thy care for me fled whither ? Wilt thou not See first where thou hast left thine age worn sire,
 Anchuses whether still survive thy wife
 Creusa and Ascanius thy child ?
 Whom all ere this, encompassed every side

¹ By pretending to be a deserter he had persuaded the Trojans to drag the wooden horse into the city

By prowling Greeks, did not my care prevent,
Or flames had snatched, or foeman's sword devoured.
Think not it is the hated face of her,
The Spartan daughter of Tyndareos,
No, nor much blamed Paris, but the gods,
The gods, whose unrelenting hate o'erturns
This empire, and Troy's loftiness brings low.
Look—for the cloud which, o'er thy vision drawn,
Dulls mortal sight, and spreads a misty murk,
I will snatch from thee utterly: but thou
Fear not thy mother's bidding, nor refuse
Her hests to hearken—here where thou but seest
Huge shattered fragments and stone rent from stone,
And dust and smoke blent in one surging sea,
Neptune with his vast trident shakes the walls,
And heaves the deep foundations, from her bed
O'ertoppling all the city. Juno here
Storms at the entrance of the Scaean gate,
Implacable, and raging, sword on thigh,
Summons her armed confederates from the ships.
Now backward glance, and on the embattled height
Already see Tritonian Pallas throned,
Flashing with storm-cloud and with Gorgon fell.
The Sire himself each Danaan heart imbues
With courage and victorious might; himself
Against our Dardan power stirs up the gods.
Son, snatch at flight, and let thine efforts end.
Nowhere will I forsake thee till set safe
Upon thy father's threshold." She had said,
And vanished in thick shadows of the night.
Dread forms appear, and mighty potentates
Of heaven, at feud with Troy.

' Ah! then mine eyes
Beheld all Ilium settling into flame,
Troy, Neptune's city, from her base o'erthrown;
As some hoar ash-tree on the mountain-tops,

Which eager husbandmen make haste to fell
 With steel and showering axe-strokes hacked and hewn
 Threatens and ever threatens and nods on
 With quaking foliage rocking crest, until
 Little by little neath the wounds o'erpowered,
 One dying groan it utters and falls stretched
 Along the hillside a root severed wreck
 I get me down and with the god to guide
 Through fire and foes win unimpeded way,
 Weapons give place to me, and flames retire'

(Aen ii 589-633 tr Rhoades)

Towards the end of the book the spectre of his lost wife Creūsa tells how he must come to a western land where high destinies await him—the first vague indication of the hero's future. He sets sail and after long wanderings reaches Aetna

LOCKED from the wind the haven is itself an ample bay;
 But hard at hand mid ruin and fear doth Aetna thunder loud

And whiles it blasteth forth on air a black and dreadful cloud
 That rolleth on a pitchy wreath where bright the ashes mix,
 And heaveth up great globes of flame and heaven's high star-world licks

And other whiles the very cliffs and even mountain maw
 It belches forth the molten stones together will it draw
 Aloft with moan and bouleth o'er from lowest inner vale
 This world of mountain presseth down, as told it is in tale,
 Enceladus the thunder scorched, huge Aetna on him cast,
 From all her bursten furnaces breathes out his fiery blast,
 And whensoever his weary side he shuffeth all the shore
 Trinacrian trembleth murmuring and heaven is smoke-clad o'er,
 In thicket close we wear the night amidst these marvels dread,
 Nor may we see what thing it is that all that noise hath shed
 For neither showed the planet fires nor was the heaven bright
 With starry zenith murky cloud hung over all the night,
 In mist of dead untimely tide the moon was hidden close

(Aen iii 570-87, tr William Morris.)

The winter months have been spent in love and idleness when Jupiter sends Mercury to remind Aeneas of his destiny. The Trojan fleet seeks to slip away unseen, but Dido comes upon Aeneas and upbraids him :

' FALSE heart, didst even think to hide
So foul a wrong, and from my land depart
In silence? Can our love, and hand once joined
In hand, not hold thee, nor the cruel death.
In store for Dido? Nay, beneath the sky
Of winter even dost thou fit out thy fleet,
And 'mid the north wind's blustering haste to go,
O heartless, over-sea? Why, wert thou not Bound for strange fields and unknown homes, and were Troy, as of old, still standing, would'st thou steer
Even for Troy across yon billowy deep?
Is it from me thou fliest? by these tears,
By thy right hand, since naught beside, alas!
Myself have left me, by our love's embrace,
And marriage-rites begun, if ever I
Did thee fair service, or if aught I am
Was dear to thee, pity a falling house,
And, if prayers yet have place, I thee conjure,
Cast the thought from thee. For thy sake the tribes
Of Libya hate me, and the nomad chiefs,
And Tyrians turn to foes: for thy sake, too,
Quenched is my honour and good name of old,
By which alone I had access to heaven.
To whom dost thou abandon me to die,
O guest, since even to this has shrunk the name
Of husband? Wherefore do I linger on?
Is't that Pygmalion, my brother, may
Pull down, the while, my battlements, or me
Gaetulian Iarbas make his thrall?
If only, if before thy flight, my arms
Had clasped a child of thine, if in my hall

Some tiny limbed Aeneas played, to bring Thee back at least in feature, I had then
Not seemed so wholly captive and forlorn'

She had said: the other by command of Jove
Kept his eyes fixed, and struggling deep at heart
To smother down the anguish, thus at length
Returns brief answer: 'Naught that thou canst plead
Of all thy countless benefits, O queen
Shall e'er by me be gainsaid, nor shall I
Tire of Elissa's memory, while of self
Still mindful, while the life-breath guides my limbs
Brief be my words to meet the need I ne'er
Took thought—suppose it not—to veil my flight
In secrecy, nor e'er before thee held
The bridegroom's torch, or to such compact came.
Had fate vouchsafed me at mine own free will
Life's course to shape, and, as my own heart prompts,
Make truce with trouble, my first fond care had been
Troy's city, and the dear ashes of my friends,
Priam's tall roof were standing, and this hand
Had, for her vanquished children, from the dust
Requickened Pergamus But Apollo now,
The lord of Gryniun to great Italy,
To Italy the Lycian oracles,
Bid me repair this is my love and this
My country If, Phoenician as thou art,
The towers of Carthage and a Libyan town
Hold thine eyes gazing wherefore grudge, I ask,
To Teucrian settlers an Ausonian home?
We too may quest for outland kingdoms me,
Oft as the night with dewy shade enfolds
The world, oft as the starry fires arise,
My sire Anchises' spirit warns in sleep,
And with its troubled look affrights, me too
The thought of young Ascanus, and the wrong

To that dear head, from whom my fault withholds
 Hesperia's empire and predestined fields.
 Now too the interpreter of heaven, by Jove
 Himself sent down—thy head and mine I call
 To witness—through the flying air has brought
 A mandate: I myself beheld the god
 Entering the city in clear light of day,
 And with these ears drank in his accents. Cease
 With thy complaints to fire thy soul and mine;
 Not self-impelled steer I for Italy.'

(Aen. iv. 305-61, tr. Rhoades.)

Aeneas then sets his men to the work of launching the fleet:

Then fall the Teucrians to the work, and all
 Along the shore drag down their lofty ships:
 The pitched keel floats, and leafy oars they bring,
 And timber from the woods unwrought, for flight
 So eager: you may mark them on the move,
 At every outlet hurrying from the town!
 As when ants plunder a huge heap of corn,
 Of winter ware, and house it in their store;
 Moves a black column o'er the plain, the spoil
 In narrow path along the grass convoying;
 Some set their shoulders to the ponderous grains,
 And push them, some drive up the rearward ranks,
 Chiding delay; the whole track seethes with toil.

(Aen. iv. 397-407, tr. Rhoades.)

At night the fleet sails. Dido sees it at dawn and curses Aeneas.
 (The remainder of the poem and the history of Rome's wars with Carthage tell how that curse was fulfilled):

NOW with new ray young Dawn was sprinkling earth,
 Leaving Tithonus' saffron couch. The queen,
 When first from her high tower she saw the light
 Whiten, and all the ships with sails arow
 Stand out to sea, and shore and harbour void,

With ne'er an oarsman, thrice and four times o'er
Smote with her hand the lovely breast, and rent
The yellow locks 'O Jupiter,' she cries,
'Shall he then go, my kingdom put to scorn,
This stranger? will they not bring arms apace,
Pursue from all the city, and some tear loose
The ships from dock? away with speed fetch fire,
Deal weapons out, ply oars!—what do I say?
Where am I? or what madness warps my wit?
Unhappy Dido! do thine impious deeds
Now touch thee home? it had been seemlier then
When thou wast offering him thy sceptre Lo!
His hand and word of honour who, they say,
Carries his country's home-gods where he goes,
And bowed the shoulder to his age-worn sire!
Ah! might I not have seized and rent his limbs
Cast them piecemeal upon the wave, cut down
His friends—his own Ascanius—and served up
The son for banquet at his father's board?
But doubtful would have proved the chance of war,
Be it so whom had I to fear death doomed?
I to their camp should have borne firebrands, filled
Their decks with flame, and, child and sire and race
Wiped out together, myself have crowned the pile
O Sun that with thy torch encompassest
All earthly deeds and Juno, messenger
And witness of my woes, and Hecate,
Name in the city crossways yelled by night,
And dread avenging sisterhood and gods
Of dying Elissa,¹ heed ye this and turn
Your power to ills that earn it and give ear
Unto my prayers If that accursed life
Must reach the harbour, and float safe to shore
If thus Jove's doom require, here stand the goal

¹ An alternative name for Dido.

THEN lots they cast for places, and the chiefs
 Themselves upon the poop shine forth afar,
 Glorious in gold and purple, for the rest,
 The crews are crowned with wreaths of poplar spray,
 And steeped in oil their naked shoulders shine
 They man the thwarts, arms stretched to oars, full stretch
 Await the signal drains each bounding heart
 Quick knocking fear, and the wild thirst for praise
 Then, when the shrill trump sounded, in a trice
 All from their bounds leapt forward, a sea-shout
 Strikes heaven, the floods foam churned with indrawn arms.
 Abreast they cleave the furrows, the whole main yawns
 Convulsed with oars and triple-pointed beaks
 Not in such heady race the two-horsed cars,
 Poured from the bounds, grip course and go, nor shake
 Their billowy reins above such scouring teams
 The drivers, hanging forward to the lash.
 Then with applause of men, shouts, favouring cheers,
 The whole grove rings the pent shore rolls along,
 And the hills, smitten, buffet back the din

(Aen v 132-50 tr Rhoades)

When the games are over Anchises appears to his son and bids him seek the prophetess of Cumae, who will lead him to the lower world, where he will learn the fate of his descendants. The fleet sets sail and on the way loses its helmsman Palinurus. The passage is a powerful piece of Virgilian description

NOW dewy night
 Had well nigh reached the mid way goal of heaven,
 In slumber calm the crews relaxed their limbs
 Beneath the oars on the hard benches stretched,
 When Sleep slid lightly from the stars on high,
 Parted the dusky air, and cleft the gloom
 Thee, Palinurus, seeking, and for thee
 Fraught with a fatal dream, though innocent

There on the high stern sat the god, and, like
To Phorbas, pours this utterance from his lips :
' O Palinurus, son of Iasus,
See, of its own will ocean wafts the fleet ;
The gales breathe equably ; the hour is given
To slumber. Bow the head, and steal from toil
The weary eyes. Myself awhile will take Thy task upon me.' With scarce lifted look,
To him speaks Palinurus : ' Bid'st thou me
Mark not the sea's smooth face and tranquil waves ?
Put faith in such a monster ? Wherefore trust
Aeneas to the false breezes, tempt again
The oft-rued treachery of a smiling sky ? '
Such words he spake, and clutched and clung, nor aught
Let go the tiller, and held his upward eyes
Still fixed upon the stars : when lo ! the god
O'er either temple shakes a bough besprent
With Lethe-dew, and drugged with Stygian power,
That loosed his swimming eyes, reluctant. Scarce

Charon, from whose rugged old chin trails down
The hoary beard of centuries: his eyes
Are fixed, but flame. His grimy cloak hangs loose
Rough-knotted at the shoulder his own hands
Pole on the boat, or tend the sail that waits
His dismal skiff and its fell freight along.
Ah, he is old, but with that toughening eld
That speaks his godhead! To the bank and him
All a great multitude come pouring down,
Brothers and husbands, and the proud-souled heroes,
Life's labour done. and boys and unwed maidens
And the young men by whose flame-funeral
Parents had wept Many as leaves that fall
Gently in autumn when the sharp cold comes
Or all the birds that flock at the turn o' the year
Over the ocean to the lands of light.
They stood and prayed each one to be first taken:
They stretched their hands for love of the other side,
But the grim sailor takes now these, now those:
And some he drives a distance from the shore.
Aeneas, moved and marvelling at this stir,
Cried—' O chaste Sibyl tell me why this throng
That rushes to the river? What desire
Have all these phantoms? and what rule's award
Drives these back from the marge, lets those go over
Sweeping the livid shallows with the oar? '
The old priestess replied in a few words,
' Son of Anchuses of true blood divine,
Behold the deep Cocytus and dim Styx
By whom the high gods fear to swear in vain
This shiftless crowd all is unsepulchred
The boatman there is Charon those who embark
The buried None may leave this beach of horror
To cross the growling stream before that hour
That hides their white bones in a quiet tomb.

A hundred years they flutter round these shores :
Then they may cross the waters long desired.'

(Aen. vi. 295-330, tr. J. E. Flecker.)

With the prophetess as his guide he passes from one region to another of the underworld, and after offering the golden bough to Persephone, queen of the lower regions, he reaches at last the Elysian fields :

THE goddess' dues accomplished, they arrived
The happy region and green pleasaunces
Of the blest woodlands, the abode of joy.

An ampler ether with purpureal light
Clothes here the plain ; another sun than ours,
And other stars they know. Some ply their limbs
Upon the grassy wrestling-ground, and strive
In sport, and grapple on the tawny sand ;
Some, footing, beat the dance, and chant the lay.
Here too the Thracian priest, with trailing robe,
Makes eloquent the seven divided notes
To match their measures, and, with fingers now,
And now with comb of ivory, strikes them. Here
Are Teucer's ancient stock, a glorious line,
The high-souled heroes born in happier years,
Ilus, Assaracus, and Dardanus,
Founder of Troy. He marvels to behold
Their arms and ghostly chariots from afar.
The spears stand fixed in earth ; their steeds, unyoked,
Roam grazing o'er the plain. What pride had each,
Alive, in arms and chariot, or what pains
To pasture his sleek steeds, the same no less
Attends them still, now hid beneath the earth.
Lo ! some he sees to right hand and to left
Feasting along the greensward, or in choir
Chanting a joyous paeon, 'mid a grove
Of perfumed bay, whence risen Eridanus

Rolls wide through forests of the upper world
 Here is the hand of those who suffered wounds,
 Fighting for country, or, while life remained
 Were priests and pure, or holy bards that spake
 Things worthy Phoebus, or who sweetened life
 With new found arts, earning by service wrought
 Of some to be remembered—these are all
 With snow white fillet bound about the brow

(Aen vi 637-65, tr Rhoades)

There he finds his father Anchises who, questioned by Aeneas about the reincarnation of souls gives a wonderful description of the soul's life and purification after death. For this passage, to which many philosophies have made their contribution, we may take the impressive English hexameters of the Poet Laureate

ON the level bosom of this vale more thickly the tall trees
 Grow, an' aneath quivering poplars and whispering alders
 Lethe's dreamy river throu peaceful scenery windeth
 Whereby now flitted in vast swarms many people of all lands,
 As when in early summer honey bees on a flowery pasture
 Pill the blossoms hurrying to' an fro—mmumerous are they,
 Revisiting the ravish'd lily cups while all the meadow hums
 Aeneas was turn'd to the sight and marvelling enquired,
 ' Say, sir, what the river that there i the vale-bottom I see?
 And who they that thickly along its bank have assembled? '
 Then Lord Anchises The spirits for whom a second life
 And body are destined ar' arriving thirsty to Lethe,
 And here drunk th' unmundful draught from wells of oblivyon
 My heart greatly desired of this very thing to acquaint thee,
 Yea, and show thee the men to be born our glory her after,
 So to gladden thine heart where now thy voyaging endeth '
 ' Must it then be believ'd my sire, that a soul which attaineth
 Elysium will again submit to her old body burden?
 Is this well? what hap can awake such dire longing in them?
 ' I will tell thee, O son nor keep thy wonder awaiting '

Answereth Anchises, and all expoundeth in order.
 ' Know first that the heavens, and th' Earth, and space fluid or void,

Night's pallid orb, day's Sun, and all his starry coaevals,
 Are by one spirit inly quickened, and, mingling in each part,
 Mind informs the matter, nature's complexity ruling.
 Thence the living creatures, man, brute, and ev'ry feather'd fowl,

And what breedeth in Ocean ancath her surface of argent :
 Their seed knoweth a fiery vigour, 'tis of airy divine birth,
 In so far as unimpeded by an alien evil,
 Nor dull'd by the body's framework condemn'd to corruption.
 Hence the desires and vain tremblings that assail them, unable Darkly prison'd to arise to celestial exaltation ;
 Nor when death summoneth them anon earth-life to relinquish,
 Can they in all discard their stain, nor wholly away with Mortality's plague-spots. It must be that, O, many wild graffs
 Deeply at heart engrain'd have rooted strangely upon them :
 Wherefore must suffering purge them, yea, Justice atone them
 With penalties heavy at their guilt : some purify exposed
 Hung to the viewless winds, or others long watery searchings
 Cleanse i' the ocean-salt, some bathe in fiery renewal :
 Each cometh unto his own retribution,—if after in ample
 Elysium we attain, but a few, to the fair Happy Woodland,
 Yet slow time still worketh on us to remove the defilement,
 Till it hath eaten away the acquir'd dross, leaving again free
 That first fiery vigour, the celestial virtue of our life.
 All whom here thou seest, have accomplished purification :
 Unto the stream of Lethe a god their company calleth,
 That forgetful of old failure, pain & disappointment,
 They may again into earthly bodies with glad courage enter.'

(Aen. vi. 703-51, tr. Bridges.)

Aeneas is then shown the long line of his successors and the heroes of Rome waiting their turn to rise to the world above, and in a few unforgettable lines Anchises tells of Rome's destiny :

OTHERS the breathing brass shall softer mould
 I doubt not, draw the lineaments of life
 From marble at the bar plead better, trace
 With rod the courses of the sky, or tell
 The rise of stars remember, Roman, thou,
 To rule the nations as their master these
 Thine arts shall be, to engraft the law of peace,
 Forbear the conquered and war down the proud'
 (Aen vi 847-53, tr Rhoades)

And so Aeneas passes out again to the upper world and rejoins his companions. The first six books of the Aeneid, with their strange adventures, may be called Virgil's Odyssey the last six, which tell of Aeneas landing in Italy and his fight for supremacy, are his Iliad. The description of war did not come naturally to Virgil's gentle spirit and few readers will feel the same pleasure in these later books. Yet they are full of incident and effective description and fuller perhaps than the first half of the poem of fine character-drawing.

The fleet sails from Cumae to the mouth of the Tiber, where Latinus is king over the region later known as Latium. He welcomes the strangers and promises Aeneas the hand of his daughter Lavinia, who had previously been betrothed to Turnus, prince of the Rutulians. Juno sends Allecto, a fury from the lower world to stir up strife.

ALLECTO lies on Stygian wing to seek
 The Teucrians marking with a new device,
 The spot where fair Iulus on the bank
 Snares the wild quarry, or on foot pursues.
 Here flings upon his hounds the maid of hell
 A sudden lury and with the well known scent
 Infects their nostrils for the stag's hot chase—
 First source of ill which set the rustic heart
 Afire for war. A stag of matchless mould
 There was and spreading antlers from its dam
 Stolen and nourished up by Tyrrheus' sons
 And their sire Tyrrheus of the royal herds

Ruler, and ranger of the wide domain.
Their sister Silvia with all tenderness
Had tamed it to obedience, and would deck
Its antlers and with pliant wreaths entwine,
Comb the wild thing, and in pure water lave.
Trained to her hand, and at the master's board
Familiar, it would wander in the woods,
And of itself again, bow late soe'er,
Home to the well-known threshold wend its way.
Now wandering wide, Iulus' ravening hounds
Amid their hunt aroused it, as down stream
It chanced to float, or on the grassy bank
The heat allayed. Ascanius, too, himself
Fired with the love of peerless praise, bent bow
And levelled shaft, nor swerved his hand for lack Of a god guiding; and with loud whirr, driven
Through belly and through flank, the bolt sped home.
But to the well-known roof for shelter fled
The stricken beast, into the homestead crept
Moaning, and, blood-bedabbled, with loud plaint,
As supplicating aid, filled all the house.
First sister Silvia, smiting hand on arm,
Cries out for help, and summons the stout hinds.
They, for within the silent forest yet
Lurks the fell pest, ere looked for, are at hand,
One with fire-hardened stake for weapon, one
With heavily knotted club: what every hand
First groping found, wrath makes a tool of war.
Tyrreus, just cleaving, as it chanced, an oak
With wedges' force split four-wise, gripped an axe,
And breathing out fierce rage, cheers on the band.
But from her watch-tower the grim goddess now,
Seizing the hour for mischief, to the stall's
High roof repairs, and from its summit winds
A pastoral point of war, on wreathèd horn

Straining the hellish note from end to end
 Shuddered the whole grove, and the forest-depths
 Re-echoed heard it Trivia's lake afar,
 Heard it Nar's river, white with sulphurous wave,
 And Velia's springs, and mothers at the sound
 Trembled and clasped their children to their breasts,
 Then, hurrying at the call the signal blast
 By the dread trumpet given from every side
 The dauntless husbandmen snatch arms and rush
 Together nor less the Trojan youth pour forth
 Aid for Ascanius through the open gates
 The ranks are set no more in rustic strife
 Is phed the knotty club or fire scared stake,
 Nay, hut with two-edged steel they fight it out,
 While the dark harvest hristles far and wide
 With naked sword blades and the flash of brass
 Sun fretted darts its radiance to the clouds
 As, when a wave beneath the rising gale
 Gins whiten the sea slowly heaves, and rears
 Its billows higher then from the lowest deep
 Mounts in one mass to heaven

(Aen vii 476-530, tr Rhoades)

Here we have Virgil, at first in his more tender mood, then vividly portraying the fever of strife

War breaks out and Aeneas sails up the Tiber to seek the help of the Arcadian prince Evander, who dwells on the hills where Rome was afterwards to stand Thus gives a great opening for Virgil's antiquarianism and we find Evander showing his guest all the spots which were afterwards to be famous and telling their legends On the Palatine he shows him the cave which Hercules burst open to slay the giant Cacus, who had stolen the hero's cattle

A SHARP peak
 Stood there, with rocky sides up-rising sheer
 Above the cave's back, far as sight could soar,
 Fit dwelling for foul birds to build in This

As headlong from the ridge it leftward leaned
 Over the river, from the right he shook
 Straining against it, and up-wrenched, and tore
 Loose from its lowest roots, then suddenly
 Launched forth; and, as he launched it, bellowed loud
 The mighty welkin, and asunder leapt
 The river banks, and the affrighted stream
 Flowed backward. But the cave and ample hall
 Of Cacus lay discovered, bare to view,
 With its dark hollows yawning to their depth:
 As the rent earth should open wide her mouth,
 Unlock the infernal dwellings and disclose
 The pale realm hated of the gods, whereby
 The vasty gulf should from above be seen,
 And the ghosts tremble, as floods in the light.

(Aen. viii. 233-46, tr. Rhoades.)

The Ninth Book narrates the gathering of the clans on either side and the attack on the Trojan camp in Aeneas' absence. Aeneas relieves the camp with the aid of Arcadian and Etrurian allies. In the course of the fighting described in the Tenth Book Turnus kills Pallas, son of Evander, while Aeneas slays Lausus, who was protecting his wounded father, Mezentius, driven from the throne of Agylla for his cruelty. The body of Lausus is brought to the rescued Mezentius, who reproaches himself:

' D ID then such joy of life
 Possess me, O my son, that in my stead
 I suffered thee, even thee whom I begat,
 To meet the foeman's stroke? Am I, thy sire,
 Saved through thy wounds, and living by thy death?
 Ah! to my sorrow now at last I know
 What exile is! now is the wound pushed home.
 Yea, and I too with infamy, my son,
 Thy name have spotted, by men's hate of me
 Thrust from the throne and sceptre of my sires!
 To mine own country and my people's spite

I should have paid the forfeit, by all deaths
 Freely have yielded up this guilty life
 Now I live on, from men and light of day
 Not yet departing, but depart I will '
 So saying, at once upon his wounded thigh
 He raised him, and, albeit from the deep wound
 His force flagged somewhat, with no downcast air
 Called for his war steed This was ay his pride,
 And this his solace, hereon he was wont
 From all his wars to ride victorious home
The sorrowing creature now he thus bespeaks
 ' We have lived long O Rhaechus, if aught long
 Pertain to mortals Or to-day shalt thou
 Bear back in triumph the bloody spoils and head
 Of yon Aeneas, and be of Lausus' pangs
 My co avenger, or, if all force fail
 Our path to open, shalt beside me lie '
 No, nor wilt thou, methinks, my bravest, deign
 Brook stranger's lidding, or a Teucrian lord '

(Aen. x. 846-66, tr Rhoades)

Aeneas kills Mezentius and then turns to the tent where the body of Pallas is surrounded by mourners.

HE likewise when the pillowed head
 And face of Pallas snowy white he saw,
 And marked the Ausonian spear head's gaping wound
 On his smooth breast spake with o'er-welling tears
 ' Poor boy, did fortune, when so hith she came,
 Envy me thee, that thou shouldst never look
 Upon my realm, or home in triumph ride ?
 Not such my parting promise touching thee
 Made to thy sire Evander, when he clasped
 And sped me forth to win a mighty realm,
 And fearful warned me that right brave the foe,
 Stubborn the race, we strove with And now he,

With empty hope fooled utterly, belike
Is proffering vows, and heaping high with gifts
The altars; we, the while, a lifeless corse,
That owes no more to any god in heaven,
Escort with sorrow's ineffectual pomp.
Unhappy, thou that wilt behold thy son
Slain piteously! Is this the home-return,
The expected triumph? This my solemn pledge?
Yet here no recreant, scarred, with shameful wounds,
Shalt see, Evander, nor a son so saved
That thou, his sire, for dreaded death shalt pray.
Ah me! Ausonia, what a tower of help
Here art thou reft of, and, Iulus, thou!'

So, having wept his fill, he bids them lift
The hapless corse, and picks a thousand men
From his whole host, and sends them to escort
The farewell pomp, and with the father's tears
Their own commingle—for so vast a grief
Scant solace, yet to that sad father due.
Others of arbutë-boughs and oaken shoots
In haste plait hurdle-wise a pliant bier,
And the heaped bed with leafy covering shroud.
High on the rustic litter him they lay;
Even as a flower by maiden's finger culled,
Or violet mild, or drooping hyacinth,
Ere yet the lustre or the loveliness
Hath from its form departed; mother Earth
Feeds it no longer, nor with strength supplies.

(Aen. xi. 39-71, tr. Rhoades.)

He sends comrades to bear the dead son back to Evander and bids his own farewell:

BUT when the long procession of his friends
Had wholly passed, Aeneas, groaning deep,
Stopped, and spake further: 'Unto other tears

We by the same grim destinies of war
Are summoned hence I bid thee hail! for aye,
O mightiest Pallas, and for aye farewell'

(Aen xi 94-8, tr. Rhoades)

Meanwhile a council of war is held in the city of Latinus. An orator, Drances (said to be modelled on Cicero) taunts Turnus, who replies in anger

' L AVISH, I wot, is aye thy wealth of tongue
Drances, when war demandeth hands and when
The sires are summoned, there the first art thou
Nathless naught need we fill our court with words,
Which, big albeit, fly from thee safe enow,
While the wall rampart keeps the foe at bay,
Nor blood yet drowns the trenches. Ay, let peal
The wordy thunder, tis thy wont of old,
And charge me Drances thou with cowardice,
Seeing thy hand hath reared such slaughter heaps
Of Teucrians and set all the fields ablaze
With trophies. What the pulse of valour can,
Yet may'st thou prove nor far methinks to seek,
But round our very ramparts swarm the foe
We march to meet them wherefore holdst aback?
Or will the war god ever make his home
But in that windy tongue, those flying feet?
What vanquished? I? Will any, thou foul liar,
Flout me as vanquished justly, who beholds
Tiber still swelling o'er with Ilran blood,
Evander's whole house by the roots laid low,
And his Arcadians stripped of arms? Not such Did Bitias prove me, and huge Pandarus,
Nor whom, a thousand in a single day,
My victor arm to nether Tartarus hurled
Pinned and shut fast within the foeman's wall.
'No safety in war?' Such brainless bodings keep

For thine own fortune, and the Dardan's head.
Ay, cease not with gross panic to whelm all
In wide confusion, laud to heaven the might
Of a twice-conquered nation, and decry
Latinus' arms beside it. Now, forsooth,
The Myrmidonian lords and Tydeus' son
Tremble before the Phrygian host, now, too,
Achilles of Larissa ; and Aufidus
From Hadria's waves flees backward. Or, again,
When feigns the schemer's villainy to cower
Before my chiding, and with terror whets
The sting of calumny ! Nay, such a life—
Cease to be troubled—by this hand of mine
Ne'er shalt thou forfeit ; let it with thee dwell,
Of that thy breast fit denizen.'

(Aen. xi. 378-410, tr. Rhoades.)

But Aeneas is advancing on the town and the council breaks up to oppose him. Among Turnus' allies is the maiden-warrior Camilla, dear to Diana. The goddess tells the girl's story to Opis, one of her attendant nymphs :

'LO! to the cruel war
Goes forth Camilla, maiden, and in vain
Girds on these arms of ours, though dear to me
Beyond all others. Nor soothly is that love,
Thou knowest, new-born to Dian, nor her heart
Touched with a sudden charm. When Metabus,
Now driven through hate of his tyrannic sway
Forth from his realm, Privernum's ancient hold
Was leaving, through the battle's press he bore
His babe in flight, to share his banishment,
And named her from her mother, in altered wise,
Camilla for Casmilla. To the long
Lone forest-heights he sped, still carrying her
Before him on his bosom. From all sides

Fierce darts beset him and in circling swarms
Hovered the Volscian soldiery when lo!
Athwart his flight full Amasenus flood
Foamed with o'erbrimming banks so wild a storm
Had burst the clouds of heaven Here fain to swim
Love for the babe withholds him and he quakes
For his dear burden Pondering every way
Hardly at last this swift resolve took root
A huge spear which the warrior's stalwart hand
Bare of hard knotted and fire seasoned oak—
To this he lashed his daughter swathed in bark
Of the wild cork and midmost of the shaft
Bound her for throwing and then with mighty hand
Poising it cried to heaven O gracious Maid
Child of Latona hauntress of the grove
I vow this babe thy servant I her sure
Thy weapon first she grasps and from her foe
Flies through the air thy suppliant For thine own
Goddess receive her I implore who now
Is to the random breezes given He spake
Drew back his arm and strongly wheeled the spear
And threw it the waves roared over the swift stream
Flies poor Camilla on the hurtling dart
But Metabus by a mighty band the while
Pressed closer plunges and in triumph plucks
His gift to Trivia from the grassy bank
Javelin and maid together Him thenceforth
Nor homes of men nor city-walls received
Nor had his wild heart brooked it but he led
A life of shepherds on the lonely hills,
Here in the brakes amid rough forest dens
Reared he his daughter upon wild mare's milk
Squeezing the teats into her tender lips
Soon as the baby feet their earliest steps
Had planted with sharp javelin's weight he armed

For thine own fortune, and the Dardan's head.
 Ay, cease not with gross panic to overwhelm all
 In wide confusion, lend to heaven the might
 Of a twice-conquered nation, and decry
 Latinus' arms beside it. Now, forsooth,
 The Myrmidonian lords and Tydens' son
 Tremble before the Phrygian host, now, too,
 Achilles of Larissa; and Aulis
 From Hadria's waves flees backward. Or, again,
 When feigns the schemer's villainy to cower
 Before my chiding, and with terror whets
 The sting of calumny! Nay, such a life—
 Cease to be troubled—by this hand of mine
 Ne'er shalt thou forfeit; let it with thee dwell,
 Of that thy breast fit denizen.'

(Idem. xi. 378-410, tr. Rhoades.)

But Aeneas is advancing on the town and the council breaks up to oppose him. Among Turnus' allies is the maiden-warrior Camilla, dear to Diana. The goddess tells the girl's story to Opis, one of her attendant nymphs:

'LO! to the cruel war
 Goes forth Camilla, maiden, and in vain
 Girds on these arms of ours, though dear to me
 Beyond all others. Nor soothly is that love,
 Thou knowest, new-born to Dian, nor her heart
 Touched with a sudden charm. When Metabus,
 Now driven through hate of his tyrannic sway
 Forth from his realm, Privernum's ancient hold
 Was leaving, through the battle's press he bore
 His babe in flight, to share his banishment,
 And named her from her mother, in altered wise,
 Camilla for Casmilla. To the long
 Lone forest-heights he sped, still carrying her
 Before him on his bosom. From all sides

Fierce darts beset him, and in circling swarms
Hovered the Volscian soldiery, when lo !
Athwart his flight full Amasenus' flood
Foamed with o'er-brimming banks, so wild a storm
Had hurst the clouds of heaven Here, fain to swim,
Love for the babe withholds him, and he quakes
For his dear hurden Pondering every way,
Hardly at last this swift resolve took root
A huge spear, which the warrior's stalwart hand
Bare, of hard knotted and fire-seasoned oak—
To this he lashed his daughter, swathed in bark
Of the wild cork, and midmost of the shaft
Bound her for throwing, and then, with mighty band
Poising it, cried to heaven " O gracious Maid,
Child of Latona, hauntress of the grove,
I vow this babe thy servant, I her sire,
Thy weapon first she grasps, and from her foe
Flies through the air, thy suppliant For thine own,
Goddess, receive her, I implore, who now
Is to the random breezes given " He spake,
Drew back his arm, and strongly wheeled the spear,
And threw it the waves roared, over the swift stream
Flies poor Camilla on the hurtling dart
But Metabus, by a mighty band the while
Pressed closer, plunges, and in triumph plucks
His gift to Trivia from the grassy bank,
Javelin and maid together Him thenceforth
Nor homes of men, nor city walls received,
Nor had his wild heart brooked it, but he led
A life of shepherds on the lonely hills
Here in the brakes amid rough forest-dens,
Reared he his daughter upon wild mare's milk,
Squeezing the teats into her tender lips.
Soon as the baby feet their earliest steps
Had planted, with sharp javelin's weight he armed

Born in far distant climes, met man to man,
To try the sword's arbitrament. But they,
Soon as the plain gave open space, dart forth,
Hurl from afar their spears, and with loud clang
Of brazen bucklers dash into the fray.
Earth groans, and thick and fast the sword-strokes shower,
Valour with chance commingling. Even as when
On mighty Sila or Taburnus' top
Two bulls for fierce encounter each on each
Rush, brow to brow; the affrighted keepers fly;
The herd stands hushed in fear; the heifers muse
Which of the twain shall lord it o'er the grove,
Which all the kine must follow; they mix amain
Blow upon blow, and gore with butting horns;
Blood streams o'er neck and shoulder; all the grove
Rebellow with the roar: not otherwise
Trojan Aeneas and the Daunian chief
Clash shields together; the vast din fills heaven.

(Aen. xii. 681-724, tr. Rhoades.)

Jupiter, resolved now that the end must come, sends a Fury to be the sign of doom to Turnus and Juturna:

EVEN as in dreams of night, when languorous sleep
Weighs down the eyelids, with vain wish we seem
Some eager course to ply, but helpless sink
Even in mid effort; and the tongue lacks power,
And the limbs' wonted strength besteads us not,
Nor voice nor utterance follows: even so,
Strain as his valour might, the goddess fell
Bars Turnus from fulfilment.

(Aen. xii. 908-14, tr. Rhoades.)

Aeneas, maddened at the sight of Pallas' belt around the shoulders of Turnus, will have no mercy. And so the Aeneid ends: the first prophetic step is taken and Aeneas' race have become the masters of Italy.

NOT such the talisman of Caesar's name,
But Caesar had, in place of empty fame,
The unresting soul, the resolution high
That shuts out every thought but victory.
Whate'er his goal, nor mercy nor dismay
He owned, but drew the sword and cleft his way ;
Pressed each advantage that his fortune gave ;
Constrained the stars to combat for the brave ;
Swept from his path whate'er his rise delayed,
And marched triumphant through the wreck he made.
(Phars. l. 143-50, tr. Goldwin Smith.)

There is power in these characterizations, as there is genuine pathos in the following description of Pompey's last night before the fatal battle of Pharsalus :

BUT night, the last glad hours of Magnus' life,
Beguiled his anxious slumbers with vain visions.
There in the theatre himself had built
He seemed to sit, and see the multitude
Innumerable of Rome ; his was the name
By joyful voices lifted to the stars ;
The roaring benches vied in their applause.
So once in days of old a youth he saw them
And heard their cheers in his first triumph's hour. . . .
Perhaps thy sleep, in torment for the morrow,
Now fortune failed, fled back to happier days ;
Perhaps in wonted riddles it foretold
Of thy fair dreams the contrary, and brought Omens of mighty woe ; or, since no more
Might fortune let thee see thy father's house,
In dreams she gave thy city to thy sight.
Break not his slumbers, guardians of the camp ;
Let ne'er a trumpet strike his ears ; for dread

From the silver age of Domitian's reign two more epics have come down to us, both on legendary subjects. We have seen¹ how the Argonautica of Apollonius Rhodius was of service to Virgil: it had, in fact, been closely reproduced in Rome's Alexandrine age by Varro Atacinus. VALERIUS FLACCUS, who died about A.D. 90, now once more handled the theme of the voyage of the Argo in search of the golden fleece. He was more independent of Apollonius, but in the silver age the pedantry of Alexandria had once again got hold of Roman poets. The poem is difficult and crabbed in expression, the Latin is often forced, and there is a lack of swing about it all. But it has its merits: there is a sustained feeling (apparent also in Apollonius) of a weird and supernatural background which runs through the poem, and there are passages of great, though perhaps rather effeminate, beauty. We may take as typical a really fine description of the adventurers' first night in the Black Sea:

THE hour increased their fears; they saw heaven's vault Wheel round, and peaks and plains snatched from their view;

Horror of darkness wrapped them all about.
The very quiet of all things, the silence
Of the whole universe affrights them, stars
And heaven begemmed with streaming locks of gold.
As one benighted amid paths unknown
Pursues his devious journey through the gloom,
Finding no rest for eye or ear, for black
The plain lies round him, vaster through the night
The trees loom thronging; all conspire to deepen
His terror of the dark—so trembled they.

(Arg. ii. 38-47.)

CAIUS PAPINIUS STATIUS, a schoolmaster of Naples, while instructing his pupils in the art of Latin verse-writing, made himself into a respectable poet. He wrote occasional verse, one gem of which is quoted elsewhere (p. 90), and chose as the subject of an epic on a grand scale a legend of Thebes, the story of the attack made by Polynices and the Argive chiefs on the city, then in the hands of his brother Eteocles. The theme was

Hurled by the mighty arm of Chthonius,
The troop's commander, clove the dusky air
A spear, but fortune aided not the cast.
Yet through the Calydonian boar's dark hide
O'er his left shoulder, nigh to blood, the point
Pierced, and the shaft smote vainly on his throat.
Then rose his hair, at his heart froze the blood,
This way and that, pale with fierce wrath, he turned Both mind and eye; waited this host for him?
'Burst forth to meet me on the open plain!
Why fear ye, why such cowardice? Alone,
'Alone I call.' Forthwith from many a nook
E'en more than he had feared rushed into view;
These from the ridges, those throng from the vales
Or from the plain itself; o'er all the way
Gleam arms; so cordoned beasts at the first cry
Break cover; time for thought was none; one way
Alone was open; for the heights he makes
Of the dread Sphinx, and climbs, his clutching hands
Torn on sharp rocks, and so the cliff's top gains.

(Theb. ii. 527-57.)

With Valerius Flaccus and Statius the long story of Roman epic comes to a close, for it is better to pass almost in silence over the Punica of Silius Italicus (A.D. 26-101). In a dreary work of seventeen books he rehearsed again the story of the Second Punic War, already treated far better by Naevius and Ennius. In agreement with an interesting criticism on the Pharsalia, put in the mouth of one of his characters by Petronius,¹ Silius introduced into an historical poem all the machinery of gods and goddesses, which seems to us appropriate only to a legendary theme. It is a sad ending, but perhaps the gradual decline of the imperial age serves to enhance the fine robustness of the early Republican poets and the lofty supremacy of Virgil.

¹ Satyricon 118.

LYRICS AND OCCASIONAL VERSE

Much Roman 'Lyric' verse is 'occasional'—that is to say, it is prompted by some event or incident which gives the author a theme for reflection or the expression of some emotion which can be suitably uttered in song form but the converse is not necessarily true—many happenings call for an epigram or an epitaph, a lampoon or a descriptive piece which cannot be classed as lyric. The verses which appear in Punch are typical occasional poems of the modern type and have many Roman counterparts in Catullus and Horace but Martial is par excellence the composer of Latin occasional verse for style and finish, for sardonic wit and cleverness, his best epigrams have rarely been surpassed. It is not without reason that Latin is still widely used for epitaphs and dedicatory inscriptions no other language can 'hit the point' with such an economy of words. In Lyrics, as in all other types of poetry, the Roman poets of classical times were entirely indebted to Greek originals for their metres the primitive Italian 'Saturnian' metre had disappeared from literature by the end of the third century B.C. and had it not been for Greek models the lyrical poems of Catullus and Horace would probably never have been written. It would however be unjust to accuse the Romans of plagiarism in borrowing metrical forms which had been already brought to perfection by the Greeks although it often imitates or translates Greek originals. Roman Lyric poetry possesses marked individual features which entitle it to be considered one of the most vigorous and authentic manifestations of the Roman genius. Catullus and Horace made no attempt to conceal what they owed to Greece yet few poets have equalled the grace and passion of Catullus while Horace in his Odes crystallised the spirit of the Augustan age in verses combining perfect form with expression with a staid and cheerful outlook upon life, which have given him perhaps a more universal popularity than any other ancient author.

Greek Lyric poetry was of two main types—the personal utterance of the writer who reveals his own thoughts and feelings in love songs, drinking songs, reflections upon life, his own life, his point of view and the Chorus song which celebrates some noteworthy event of general interest by means of a band of singers and dancers. The two most famous representatives of the first type were the Lesbians, Alcaeus and Sappho (towards the end of the seventh century B. C.). Simonides of Keos (556-468 B. C.) and the Boeotian Pindar (522-448 B. C.) were the two greatest of the professional lyric poets, who were employed to compose special odes on memorable occasions. Pindar, whose odes commemorating victories in the great games of Greece have been preserved to us, was much more than a mere 'laureate': although he wrote to order, he was a true poet, with a sublimity of diction and a depth of religious feeling which place him among the world's great poets. Horace, while acknowledging his supremacy, counts all attempts to imitate him as presumption foredoomed to failure, and considers his elaborate dithyrambs to be bound by no regular metrical laws. Yet, while Alcaeus and Sappho and other poets of their kind were the models for many of Horace's most charming poems, it was Pindar who inspired him to introduce into Roman poetry the most splendid of his innovations—the national patriotic lyric. Perhaps the greatest difference between Greek and Roman Lyric poetry lies in the fact that Greek lyrics were written to be sung—the music was in fact an essential part of the poem—whereas the Roman lyric was, as a rule, unaccompanied. There are other Greek influences to be noted, especially upon the side of 'occasional' verses: among these were the pungent invective of Archilochus and Hipponax, who were masters of scurrilous abuse; the elegies of Mimnermus and Theognis; and, above all, the learned but frigid 'conceits' of the Alexandrine School, who flourished at the court of the Ptolemies in the third and second centuries B. C., a period when creative inspiration was largely replaced by technical skill, elaborate excursions into the by-ways of mythology, and a vein of romance which was apt to degenerate into morbid, self-centred sentimentality. The influence of Alexandrinism was especially strong at Rome during the first half of the last century B. C., and many traces of it can be seen in the work of the first¹ great Roman Lyric poet, GAIUS VALERIUS CATULLUS (? 84-54 B. C.).² A native of Verona, in the Province of Cisalpine Gaul, not yet incorporated in Italy, Catullus shows many traits of the Celtic temperament, in the violence of his passions, his tenderness and gaiety, his sudden changes of mood, his delight

¹ Laevius (born about 120 B. C.) was probably the first Roman poet who wrote in lyric metres derived from Greece: but only fragments remain.

² See pp. 21, 130 ff.

Puir, foolish, fondling, bonnie bird,
 Ye little ken what wark ye're leavin':
 Ye've gar'd my lassie's een grow red,
 Those bonnie een grow red wi' grievin'.

(iii.¹ tr. Anon. Oxford Book of Latin Verse.)

LESBIA mine, let's live and love!
 Give no doit for tattle of
 Crabbed old censorious men;
 Suns may set and rise again,
 But when our short day takes flight
 Sleep we must one endless night.
 Kiss me times a thousand o'er,
 Then a hundred, then once more
 Thousand, hundred—and once more!
 Then, so many kisses kissed,
 Mix the count, that it be missed,
 And no evil tongue may scold
 Such a many kisses told.

(v.¹ tr. Sir William Marris.²)

I HATE, I love—the cause thereof
 Belike you ask of me:
 I do not know, but feel 'tis so,
 And I'm in agony.

(lxxxv. tr. Marris.)

WHENE'ER to man who hungers hopelessly
 His dream comes true, then that is sheer delight;
 So, Lesbia, that you have come back to me
 Is joy more dear than gold is to my sight,
 Who longed and longed but never hoped for you.
 And you've come back to me! O day of bliss!

¹ These two poems and many others by Catullus are written in the Hendecasyllabic (Eleven syllables) Metre attempted by Tennyson in 'O you chorus of indolent reviewers'. Catullus probably introduced this metre into Roman literature; it was afterwards used with effect by Martial.

² Clarendon Press, 1924.

Who is as happy as am I? or who

Can think of aught in life as sweet as this?

(cvi tr Marris)

IF it be good to mind each kindly act,
 Good for a man to feel he's been a friend
 And kept his promise, nor in any pact
 Abused the gods to serve a treacherous end,
 Then for long days to come, Catullus, you've
 Pleasures laid up from your unthankful love
 For all that men could do or say that's kind
 To man, all these things have you done or said
 They're lost—you trusted in a thankless mind,
 Wherefore of them why longer vex your head?
 No, brace your mind and think no more thereof,
 Throw off this gloom that comes not from the gods,
 'Tis hard to drop at once old standing love,
 'Tis hard, but do it, ay, at any odds!
 'Tis the one chance and you must struggle through it,
 Impossible or not, you've got to do it
 O gods, if ye can pity, or if e'er
 Ye helped a man by very death oppressed,
 Look on my pain, and if my life be fair
 Preserve me from this ruin and this pest!
 O what a torpor doth my limbs o'er-wear
 And driveth all the gladness from my breast!
 Not now I ask, she love me once again
 Nor (since it cannot be) that chaste she be,
 But make me whole and rid me of this bane,
 Gods, grant me this thing for my piety

(lxvii tr Marris)

FORGO your dream poor fool of love,
 And write your certain losses off,
 Time was the sun shone bright on you
 And where she led you you would go,

Puir, foolish, fondling, bonnie bird,
 Ye little ken what wark ye're leavin' :
 Ye've gar'd my lassie's een grow red,
 Those bonnie een grow red wi' grievin'.

(iii.¹ tr. Anon. Oxford Book of Latin Verse.)

LESBIA mine, let 's live and love !
 Give no doit for tattle of
 Crabbed old censorious men ;
 Suns may set and rise again,
 But when our short day takes flight
 Sleep we must one endless night.
 Kiss me times a thousand o'er,
 Then a hundred, then once more
 Thousand, hundred—and once more !
 Then, so many kisses kissed,
 Mix the count, that it be missed,
 And no evil tongue may scold
 Such a many kisses told.

(v.¹ tr. Sir William Marris.²)

I HATE, I love—the cause thereof
 Belike you ask of me :
 I do not know, but feel 'tis so,
 And I'm in agony.

(lxxxv. tr. Marris.)

WHENE'ER to man who hungers hopelessly
 His dream comes true, then that is sheer delight ;
 So, Lesbia, that you have come back to me
 Is joy more dear than gold is to my sight,
 Who longed and longed but never hoped for you.
 And you've come back to me ! O day of bliss !

¹ These two poems and many others by Catullus are written in the Hendecasyllabic (Eleven syllables) Metre attempted by Tennyson in 'O you chorus of indolent reviewers'. Catullus probably introduced this metre into Roman literature; it was afterwards used with effect by Martial.

² Clarendon Press, 1924.

Who is as happy as am I? or who

Can think of aught in life as sweet as this?

(cvii tr Marris)

IF it be good to mind each kindly act,
 Good for a man to feel he's been a friend
 And kept his promise, nor in any pact
 Abused the gods to serve a treacherous end,
 Then for long days to come, Catullus, you've
 Pleasures laid up from your unthankful love
 For all that men could do or say that's kind
 To man, all these things have you done or said
 They're lost—you trusted in a thankless mind,
 Wherefore of them why longer vex your head?
 No, brace your mind and think no more thereof,
 Throw off this gloom that comes not from the gods,
 'Tis hard to drop at once old standing love,
 'Tis hard, but do it, ay, at any odds!
 'Tis the one chance and you must struggle through it,
 Impossible or not, you've got to do it
 O gods, if ye can pity, or if e'er
 Ye helped a man by very death oppressed,
 Look on my pain, and if my life be fair
 Preserve me from this rum and this pest!
 O what a torpor doth my limbs o'er wear
 And driveth all the gladness from my breast!
 Not now I ask she love me once again,
 Nor (since it cannot be) that chaste she be,
 But make me whole and rid me of this bane,
 Gods grant me this thing for my piety

(lxxvi tr Marris)

FORGO your dream poor fool of love,
 And write your certain losses off,
 Time was the sun shone bright on you
 And where she led you you would go

ALL Persian ostentation, boy, I hate;
 In garlands woven with bast I see no grace;
 Leave off this eager search from place to place,
 To find where roses linger late.

See to it and take heed no flowers to twine
 With the plain myrtle; myrtle well befits
 The servant, and the master, as he sits
 Quaffing beneath the trellised vine.

(Odes i, 38, tr. F. Coultts.)

This version, by Herrick, shows how much the English poet owes, both in spirit and in style, to Horace:

Hor. WHILE, Lydia, I was lov'd of thee,
 Nor any was preferr'd 'fore me
 To hug thy whitest neck: than I,
 The Persian King liv'd not more happily.

Lyd. While thou no other didst affect,
 Nor Cloe was of more respect;
 Then Lydia, far-fam'd Lydia,
 I flourish't more than Roman Ilia.

Hor. Now Thracian Cloe governs me,
 Skillfull i' th' Harpe, and Melodie:
 For whose affection, Lydia, I
 (So Fate spares her) am well content to die.

Lyd. My heart now set on fire is
 By Ornithes sonne, young Calais;
 For whose commutuell flames here I
 (To save his life) twice am content to die.

Hor. Say our first loves we sho'd revoke,
 And sever'd, joyne in brazen yoke:
 Admit I Cloe put away,
 And love again love-cast-off Lydia?

Lyd Though mine be brighter than the Star
 Thou lighter than the Cork by far,
 Rough as th Adratick sea yet I
 Will live with thee or else for thee will die
 (in 9 tr Herrick,)

BANDUSIA¹ stainless mirror of the sky!
 Thine is the flower-crowned bowl for thee shall die
 When dawns yon sun the kid
 Whose horns half seen half hid
 Challenge to dalliance or to strife—in vain
 Soon must the firstling of the wild herd be slain
 And these cold springs of thine
 With blood incarnadine

Fierce glows the Dog star but his fiery beam
 Toucheth not thee still grateful thy cool stream
 To labour wearied ox
 Or wanderer from the flocks

And henceforth thou shalt be a royal fountain
 My harp shall tell how from thy cavernous mountain
 Where the brown oak grows tallest
 All babblingly thouallest

(in 13 tr C S Calverley)

The last ode of the Third Book forms a fitting close to this selection at the time when it was written Horace probably felt that he had finished his work as a Lyric poet, the Fourth Book was written after a considerable interval mainly with the object of celebrating the victories of Augustus and his family The claim that he is the first poet to mate

 To lyre of Latium Aeolic lay

is not strictly true but it is in part justified by the fact that in the variety of his metres Horace far surpassed any preceding Roman poet

¹ A fountain near the birthplace of Horace in Apulia (S Italy)

NOW have I made my monument : and now
 Nor brass shall longer live, nor loftier raise
 The royallest pyramid its superb brow.
 Nor ruin of rain or wind shall mar its praise,
 Nor tooth of Time, nor pitiless pageantry
 O' the flying years. In death I shall not die
 Wholly, nor Death's dark Angel all I am
 Make his ; but ever flowerlike my fame
 Shall flourish in the foldings of the Mount
 Capitoline, where the Priests go up, and mute
 The maiden Priestesses.

From mean account
 Lifted to mighty, where the resolute
 Waters of Aufidus reverberant ring
 O'er fields where Daunus once held rustic state,
 Of barren acres simple-minded king,—
 There was I born, and first of men did mate
 To lyre of Latium Aeolic lay.
 Clothe thee in glory, Muse, and grandly wear
 Thy hardly-gotten greatness, and my hair.
 Circle, Melpomene, with Delphian bay.

(Odes iii, 30, tr. H. W. Garrod.)

Among the shorter poems which have been attributed to VIRGIL,¹ some, at any rate, are probably genuine; and it is worth while to quote one in which the poet, in the manner of Catullus, announces his intention of forsaking the study of rhetoric for the epicureanism of the philosopher Siro :

A VAUNT, ye vain bombastic crew,
 Crickets that swill no Attic dew :
 Good-bye, grammarians crass and narrow,
 Silius, Tarquitiu's, and Varro :
 A pedant tribe of fat-brained fools,
 The tinkling cymbals of the schools !

¹ See pp. 22 ff., 112 ff., 131, 212 ff.

Sextus, my friend of friends, good bye,
 With all our pretty company!
 I'm sailing for the blissful shore,
 Great Siro's high recondite lore,
 That haven where my life shall be
 From every tyrant passion free
 You too sweet Muses mine, farewell
 Sweet muses mine for truth to tell
 Sweet were ye once, but now begone
 And yet, and yet return anon,
 And when I write at whales be seen
 In visits shy and far between

(tr Sir T H Warren)

MARCUS VALERIUS MARTIALIS (?40-102 A D) like Lucan the Senecas, and Quintilian was a Spaniard by birth, though Rome was the scene of his poetical activity. He supported himself for thirty four years mainly upon the sale of his epigrams, won the friendship of many men of eminence in letters or public life, and succeeded in gaining the favour of the Emperor Domitian, whom he flattered with amazing servility,¹ and other wealthy patrons. Thus he was frankly a professional poet and toady to the great and wrote to please or amuse his contemporaries, though there is a satirical flavour about much of his work, he did not like Juvenal claim to be animated by any lofty moral purpose. He can show genuine feeling and pathos, and has an eye for the picturesque but it is as a wit that he occupies the first place in Roman poetry. Modelling himself largely upon Catullus, he has a perfect command over language, a light but sure touch, a lucidity and point possessed by no other poet of what is called the Silver Age of Latin literature. If we seek for modern English parallels we may perhaps find them in such poets as Prior, Praed, Calverley, or Austin Dobson. His subjects range over almost the whole of fashionable life—the streets—the theatres—the baths—the suburbs and surroundings of Rome—the hardships of 'hangers on', the wiles of legacy hunters—the stinginess of rich hosts, the impudence of plagiarists—all the vices and follies of the day are described in a brilliant series of vignettes which give us a clear, often lurid, insight into the decadent civilization of Rome in the first century of the Empire.

¹ Always however with his tongue in his cheek we suspect under emperors like Nero and Domitian flattery was an essential condition of success as a poet.

It is impossible here to do justice to Martial's many-sided talents, but the following epigrams represent more than one aspect:

Stingy Readers

LUPERCUS, when we meet each day,
 ' May I not send my boy ' you say,
 ' To fetch your Epigrams, and when
 I've read, I'll send them back again ? '
 No need, Lupercus, to employ
 On such a task your busy boy.
 My house is far away: I sleep
 Three storeys up: the stairs are steep.
 You'll find the thing you want more near:
 For the Book-quarter first you steer:
 (To buy, of course, you're often here!)
 To Caesar's Forum, there's a shop
 Just opposite, where, if you stop,
 The posted names of bards you'll read:
 To call the Owner there's no need:
 Just ask for Martial: he to you
 Will soon be given, smooth-shaved and new,
 And robed in gorgeous raiment blue.
 A mere half-crown your Martial buys:
 ' What! half-a-crown! ' Lupercus cries,
 ' No, no! '—Lupercus, you are wise.
 (Book I, cxvii, tr. W. J. Courthope.)

The Libellous Poet

CINNA is said to libel me: who heeds?
 He does not write, whose poems no man reads.
 (III, ix, tr. W. J. Courthope.)

stinginess of rich hosts, the impudence of plagiarists—all the vices and follies of the day are described in a brilliant series of vignettes which give us a clear, often lurid, insight into the decadent civilization of Rome in the first century of the Empire.

It is impossible here to do justice to Martial's many-sided talents, but the following epigrams represent more than one aspect:

Stingy Readers

LUPERCUS, when we meet each day,
 ' May I not send my boy ' you say,
 ' To fetch your Epigrams, and when
 I've read, I'll send them back again ? '
 No need, Lupercus, to employ
 On such a task your busy boy.
 My house is far away: I sleep
 Three storeys up: the stairs are steep.
 You'll find the thing you want more near:
 For the Book-quarter first you steer:
 (To buy, of course, you're often here!)
 To Caesar's Forum, there's a shop
 Just opposite, where, if you stop,
 The posted names of bards you'll read:
 To call the Owner there's no need:
 Just ask for Martial: he to you
 Will soon be given, smooth-shaved and new,
 And robed in gorgeous raiment blue.
 A mere half-crown your Martial buys:
 ' What! half-a-crown! ' Lupercus cries,
 ' No, no! '—Lupercus, you are wise.
 (Book I, cxvii, tr. W. J. Courthope.)

The Libellous Poet

CINNA is said to libel me: who heeds?
 He does not write, whose poems no man reads.
 (III, ix, tr. W. J. Courthope.)

WHAT sin was mine, sweet, silent boy-god, Sleep,
Or what, poor sufferer, have I left undone,
That I should lack thy guerdon, I alone?

Quiet are the brawling streams: the shuddering deep
Sinks, and the rounded mountains feign to sleep.
The high seas slumber pillowed on Earth's breast;
All flocks and birds and beasts are stilled in rest,
But my sad eyes their nightly vigil keep.

O! if beneath the night some happier swain,
Entwined in loving arms, refuse thy boon
In wanton happiness,—come hither soon,
Come hither, Sleep. Let happier mortals gain
The full embrace of thy soft angel wing:
But touch me with thy wand, or hovering
Above mine eyelids sweep me with thy train.

(Silv. v. 4, tr. W. H. Fyfe.)

DIDACTIC POETRY

POETRY has in most languages been used from time to time as the vehicle of definite teaching. In English we have comparatively few examples, dealing mostly with morals rather than science, and belonging almost exclusively to the eighteenth century. Pope's Essay on Man is the most conspicuous of these. In antiquity the practice was more general, probably for two reasons. In the first place, before writing became general the maxims which men wished to remember would be couched in verse, which is more easily kept in mind than prose, so that it was not unnatural for an instructive treatise to be written in verse too. In the second place all poets in Greece and Rome regarded themselves much more definitely as instructors than they do nowadays. Thus in Aristophanes' comedy The Frogs the two tragic poets Aeschylus and Euripides engage in a contest in the lower world as to which of them was the greater poet when alive, and both alike claim to have taught the people of Athens for their good. So too the Roman drama, both tragedy and comedy, was full of brief moral maxims which would stay in men's minds and become household words and indeed collections of such maxims from the poets were made.

In Greece the earliest poetry we possess after Homer is didactic, the work of a Boeotian poet Hesiod (c. 800 B.C.). He wrote a Theogony, which did much to fix the floating ideas about the gods and their characters and their relations to one another, but more important for our purpose, because it served as a model to Virgil, was a poem called The Works and Days, in which he gives instructions to a farmer brother as to the working of his farm.

In the fifth century didactic poetry was turned to a new use when two philosophers used verse as the medium for expounding their theories of the nature of the world. Parmenides of Elea (c. 500 B.C.) had no direct effect on Latin writers, but for Empedocles of Agrigentum (c. 450 B.C.), who held that the world was composed of the four 'elements', earth, air, fire, and water, Lucretius expresses the greatest admiration (l. 716-34), and it is clear that he took Empedocles' poem On Nature as his own model.

• During the great era of Athenian literature didactic poetry is missing and we do not find it again till the Alexandrian age. There, in the great Hellenistic city on the Egyptian coast, Greek literature had a revival (see The Pageant of Greece, xiii), and, as that revival was largely based on learning, it is not surprising that didactic poetry should come to its own again. Natural history was represented by Nicander, who wrote among other things a poem no longer extant on Bee-keeping, which is thought to have been Virgil's model in the fourth Georgic. Astronomy again was much in vogue at Alexandria, and the two poets Aratus and Eratosthenes supplied Virgil with some of his astronomical lore, and also with certain passages on signs of the weather and on lucky and unlucky days for agricultural work—for astronomy was already degenerating into astrology, the 'science' of deducing man's fortunes from the position of the stars. It was a rather dreary theme, but for some reason it made, as we shall see, a special appeal to Roman writers. Yet another branch of learning which produced didactic poetry in Alexandria was archaeology. The learned poet Callimachus, who was librarian of the great library, produced a poem on Origins, an antiquary's poem, which is interesting to us, because it was Ovid's model when he came to write on the Roman religious calendar.

In Rome it is clear that from early times verse was used as a means of committing short and pithy sayings to memory, and as far back as the fourth century B. C. aphorisms of this kind in the rough native Italian metre known as 'Saturnian' are attributed to the Censor, APPIUS CLAUDIUS CAECUS (circ. 312 B. C.). A few have been preserved to us, such as,

'Every man must forge his own fortune,'

'When you see a friend, forget your sorrows.'

But there is no evidence of consecutive didactic verse till the tragedian Accius (circ. 135 B. C.¹) wrote a sort of history of Latin poetry which he named 'Instructions' (Didascalica), and his example was followed in the next century by Volcatius Sedigitus², whose strange verses, in which he arranged the Roman comedians in order of merit, have been preserved to us, and Porcius Licinus³, of whom we have left a rather embittered comment on Terence and his relations with Scipio. These works, however, belong rather to the province of literary criticism.

In the second half of the last century B. C., the time of the great internal struggles which led to the overthrow of the Roman

¹ See p. 175 ff.

² See p. 356.

³ See p. 355.

Republic and the establishment of the Empire a passion for the Greek literature of Alexandria swept over Rome and the young poets of the day occupied themselves in reproducing Alexandrian works in Latin with all their learning and conceits and obscurities. The great orator MARCUS TULLIUS CICERO¹ though in later life he poured scorn on these modernists was in his earlier years attracted by the movement and laboriously translated the Phenomena of Aratus a tiresome work on astronomy. In order to show what these early efforts were like and to emphasize the contrast between these first beginnings of Latin didactic poetry and what it afterwards became we may translate a short extract from the four or five hundred lines of Cicero's poem which survive. The poem has a further interest for us in that Lucretius evidently had some admiration for it and introduced occasional phrases and words from Cicero into his own much greater work. The poet is describing the constellations in turn and has reached the winged horse Pegasus.

AS he moves on swift Pegasus is touched
 By the bright Fishes and Aquarius
 Pats his soft neck Nor does the mighty Horse
 Visit the western sky till Capricorn
 Breathes stiffening cold from out his shaggy breast
 Half man half beast set on the sun's high course
 Whom when he touches with undying rays
 Phoebus in winter turns about his car
 Beware this month to venture on the sea
 Short is the daylight then for ocean voyage
 In no swift round moves on the winter night
 Tardily then in answer to thy prayers
 Will dawn return to usher in the sun
 With furious blows the winds will lash the waves
 And shivering cold will shake thy frozen limbs
 Yet all the while the years are rolling on
 No stars delay their course no blasts they Nor fear the foam flecked waters threaten

{A

Their leafie roosts, and through the verdant field
 Soft flames thou dost in every breast infuse ;
 So a fresh Off-spring still the Age renews.
 Since then ore Nature thou sole Queen dost reign,
 Nor ought without thee may the light attain,
 Or can be frolick, or be pleasant made ;
 Assist these studious numbers with thine ayde,
 While I essay of Natures works to tell
 For honor'd Memmius, who doth most excell,
 By thee accomplisht ; Goddess, O bestow
 Eternal grace on what from me shall flow,
 That whilst I write, by Seas and land may cease
 Fierce Wars clos'd in an everlasting peace.

(i. 1-30, tr. J. Evelyn.)

This is an example of Lucretius's freer manner, where the poet is not hampered by the difficulties of his philosophic thought. We may take another passage from the First Book of a more closely argumentative character, though in it too it is easy to see the poet's hand enlivening and enriching the theoretical discussion with beautiful illustrations and imaginative touches of language. Lucretius is arguing that we need not wonder because the atoms, the material of all creation, are unseen ; there are other bodies which we cannot see, whose effects we can yet realize, such as wind. We will quote this time from the vigorous modern rendering of Sir R. Allison.

AND now since I have taught that nothing comes
 From nothing, and once born can ne'er return
 To naught again, yet lest you should begin
 To doubt my words, because you nothing see
 Of these first elements, know there are things
 Which must exist, and yet are never seen.
 First then the tempest's force beats on the shores
 And wrecks the mighty ships, and drives the clouds,
 While passing o'er the plains with hurried force
 It strews its course with mighty trees, and strikes
 The topmost mountains blows that shake the woods,

So fiercely roars, with threatening voice, the storm,
There are then, it would seem, these viewless winds,
Endowed with bodies which you cannot see,
Which sweep along the earth, the sea, the sky,
And vex with sudden whirlwinds, nor do they Stream on and scatter havoc otherwise
Than as the gentle force of water, when
With sudden stream, augmented from the hills
By heavy rains, it rushes from above
Hurling the forest's wrack and mighty trees
Nor can the strong-built bridges ev'n endure
Its sudden onset, driven by the floods
The river rushes on the piles with all
Its strength, spreads ruin with a roar,
Displaces mighty stones, and sweeps away
Whatever may impede its onward rush
Just so then must the blasts of wind advance,
And when like some strong stream they have been borne
In one direction, they sweep all away
And ruin all around with frequent storms,
Or sometimes catch things up with eddying whirls
And bear them off with swirling hurricanes
Wherefore once more there are, be sure, these winds,
Whose forms you cannot see, which emulate
In deeds and ways the mighty river's force,
All visible enough (l. 265-97. tr. Allison)

Note the subtlety of the comparison within the comparison. The action of the atoms is illustrated by that of the wind, which in its turn is compared to that of a rushing stream.

In the Second Book the poet deals with the motions of the atoms and their combinations with greater or lesser intervals of space to form things, and finally shows that the atoms themselves possess none of the 'secondary qualities' of colour, taste, sound, and smell, nor the capacity of sensation, but that all these are produced in compounds by the combination of particular atoms with particular motions in particular arrangements. This leads up to the argument of the Third Book in which he shows that the soul too owes its sensations to its atomic constitution and that it loses it at death. Consider first a wonderful passage in which he illustrates the constant motion of the atoms in space by the movement of motes in a sunbeam, and concludes by pointing out that these motes are after all the smallest atomic compounds which we can perceive in motion and therefore actually nearest to the atoms.

LOOK where the sun
Through some dark corner pours his brightest beams,
A thousand little bodies you will see
Mix in the rays, and there for ever fight
Arrayed in mimic troops, no pause they give
But meet and part again, nor ever cease.
From this you may conjecture of the germs
What 'tis for ever in the mighty void
To be tossed up and down. In some degree
Such small events may illustrate great things,
And give a clue to knowledge. So 'tis well
That you should note these bodies how they rush
In the sun's rays, because such rushes show
What secret hidden forces lie below.
For you will see that things are often driven
By unseen blows to change their course, and then Driven back return now here, now there, again
On every side. And mark this, motions are Due always to the primal germs themselves.
The germs move of themselves : the lesser ones,
Nearest the force of those from which they spring,
Are driven onward by their unseen blows
And stir up those that somewhat larger are.
Thus motion mounts up by degrees, and so
Reaches our senses, so that those same germs,
That in the sunlight we can see, are moved
As well, and yet we cannot see the blows
By which they are for ever tossed about.

The same subtlety of description and brilliant vividness of illustration is seen in a later passage where the poet is explaining just as a modern man of science might that in a body which as a whole is at rest the innumerable component atoms are yet in quick unceasing motion. The two pictures of the sheep on the hillside and the manœuvring army show the eye of the artist. In this passage we may take the translation of the seventeenth century scholar Thomas Creech

BUT more 'tis nothing strange that every Mass
Seems quiet and at rest and keeps its place
Tho every little part moves here and there:
For since the Principles too subtle are
For sight their motion too must disappear,
Nay Objects fit for Sense which distant lie
Conceal their motions too and cheat our eye
For often on a Hill the wanton Sheep
At distance plac'd o're flow'ry Pastures creep
Where e're herbs crown'd with Pearly dew invite
And kindly call their eager Appetite
The Lambs their bellies full with various turns
Play o're the field and try their tender Horns
Yet all these seem confus'd at distance seen
And like a steddy White spread o're the Green
Besides when two embattled Armies rage
Throughout a spacious Plain at last engage
When all run here and there the furious Horse
Beat o're the trembling Fields with nimble force
Straight dreadful sparklings from the Arms appear
And fill with a strange light the wond'ring Air
Th' Earth groans beneath their feet the Hills around
Flattering the noise restore the dreadful sound
And yet twould seem if from a Mountain shown
A steddy Light and a continued one

(u 308-32 tr Creech)

argument of two ones of lowes it at day illustrates the element of that these of which we can the atoms.

LOOK
The
A

Men in the Arranged
But not
From the
What the
To be the Such words
And now
That you
In the sun
What of
For you will
By unseen Driven by
On every side
Down about
The power Nearest the
Are driven
And in the
That is the Darker of
That is the
And in the
By which it

And passion glances from the flashing eyes,
 There 's the cold breath of air that waits on fear,
 Which makes our members shudder, thrills us through,
 And there 's the light and gentle air, which goes
 With mind at ease and cheerful countenance.
 But more of heat they have whose passionate heart
 And angry mind give way with ease to wrath
 First come the lions with terrific force,
 Who with their roaring split their very heart,
 Nor can contain their floods of rage within
 The chilly mind of stags has more of wind,
 More quickly drives chill air throughout the limbs,
 And makes their frame to tremble While the ox
 Lives rather on still air, nor does the flame,
 The smoky flame of anger rouse it so,
 Pouring dark shadows round, nor does it lie
 Trembling, transfixed with the icy darts of fear
 It comes between the stags and savage lions.

(in 269-306, tr Allison)

To illustrate the triumph song we may take a passage of striking imagination in which the poet supposes nature to rebuke men who are unwilling to depart from life and to face their death. We may quote again from Creech—he does not here keep very close to the Latin, but gives in vigorous verse the sense of the original

BUT now if Nature should begin to speak,
 And thus with loud complaints our Folly check,
Fond Mortal, what 's the matter thou do'st sigh?
 Why all these tears, because thou once must die,
 And once submit to strong Mortality?
 For if the Race thou hast already run
 Was pleasant, if with joy thou saw'st the Sun,
 If all my pleasures did not pass thy mind
 As thro a Steve, but left some Sweets behind
 Why do st thou not then like a thankful Guest
 Rise chearfully from Life's abundant Feast,

AND, first of all, the several parts of earth
Being heavy, mixed together, met and took
The lowest places : the more mixed they were,
The closer that their union was together,
The more they squeezed out those which then became
The sea, the stars, the moon, the sun and all
The world's great walls. And all of these were formed
Of light round atoms and much smaller things
Than was the earth. And then through openings fine,
Outbursting from the earth, the ether rose,
Fire-bearing ether, with its many flames ;
Just as we often see at early dawn,
When the sun's bright rays blush golden o'er the grass,
Sparkling with dew, and pools and rivers then
Exhale a mist, and earth itself almost
Appears to smoke, when all of these aloft
Are met together, then do clouds on high
With solid body cover up the sky.
'Twas thus the light diffused ether spread
And arched itself all round towards every part,
And hemmed in all things round with greedy grasp.
Then followed on with birth of sun and moon
Whose spheres turn round 'twixt ether and the earth,
Whom neither earth nor ether has annexed,
Not being so heavy as to settle down,
Nor yet so light as to pursue their way
In topmost coasts : and yet so placed between
The two, that living they roll on and are
Parts of the world, just as in us some part
May be at rest, while others move along.
Then these withdrawn, the earth, where now there spreads
The ocean's blue expanse, fell in at once,
And flooded all its trenches with salt gurge.
And daily, as the sun's and ether's heat
Forced with repeated blows to a solid mass

The earth to its furbest bounds, so that condensed
It gathered to its centre, so the more
The moisture forced from it increased the sea
And ocean's floating fields by oozing forth,
And evermore the parts of heat and air
Escaped and flew abroad and there condensed,
Far, far from earth, the glittering realms above
The plains sank down, the lofty mountains grew,
For rocks could not subside, nor all the parts
Sink to one common level all throughout

(v 449-94 tr. Allison)

The earth once created and the sea fitting into its place upon it, animals and birds first came into being. Their life was a struggle, as they preyed upon one another. In a passage, which has often been recognized as closely akin to modern ideas, he describes the 'survival of the fittest'

AND in the ages after monsters died,
Perforce there perished many a stock, unable
By propagation to forge a progeny
For whatsoever creatures thou beholdest
Breathing the hreath of life, the same have been
Even from their earliest age preserved alive
By cunning or by valour, or at least
By speed of foot or wing. And many a stock
Remaineth yet because of use to man
And so committed to man's guardianship
Valour hath saved alive fierce lion breeds
And many another terrorizing race,
Cunning the foxes, flight the antlered stags
Light-sleeping dogs with faithful heart in hreast,
However, and every kind begot from seed
Of beasts of draft, as, too, the woolly flocks
And horned cattle, all, my Memmius,
Have been committed to guardianship of men
For anxiously they fled the savage beasts.

AND, first of all, the several parts of earth
Being heavy, mixed together, met and took
The lowest places : the more mixed they were,
The closer that their union was together,
The more they squeezed out those which then became
The sea, the stars, the moon, the sun and all
The world's great walls. And all of these were formed
Of light round atoms and much smaller things
Than was the earth. And then through openings fine,
Outbursting from the earth, the ether rose,
Fire-bearing ether, with its many flames ;
Just as we often see at early dawn,
When the sun's bright rays blush golden o'er the grass,
Sparkling with dew, and pools and rivers then
Exhale a mist, and earth itself almost
Appears to smoke, when all of these aloft
Are met together, then do clouds on high
With solid body cover up the sky.
'Twas thus the light diffused ether spread
And arched itself all round towards every part,
And hemmed in all things round with greedy grasp.
Then followed on with birth of sun and moon
Whose spheres turn round 'twixt ether and the earth,
Whom neither earth nor ether has annexed,
Not being so heavy as to settle down,
Nor yet so light as to pursue their way
In topmost coasts : and yet so placed between
The two, that living they roll on and are
Parts of the world, just as in us some part
May be at rest, while others move along.
Then these withdrawn, the earth, where now there spreads
The ocean's blue expanse, fell in at once,
And flooded all its trenches with salt gurge.
And daily, as the sun's and ether's heat
Forced with repeated blows to a solid mass

The earth to its furthest bounds so that condensed
It gathered to its centre, so the more
The moisture forced from it increased the sea
And ocean's floating fields by oozing forth,
And evermore the parts of heat and air
Escaped and flew abroad and there condensed
Far, far from earth the glittering realms above
The plains sank down the lofty mountains grew,
For rocks could not subside, nor all the parts
Sink to one common level all throughout

(v 449-94 tr. Allison)

The earth once created and the sea fitting into its place upon it, animals and birds first came into being. Their life was a struggle, as they preyed upon one another. In a passage, which has often been recognized as closely akin to modern ideas, he describes the 'survival of the fittest'

AND in the ages after monsters died
Perforce there perished many a stock, unable
By propagation to forge a progeny
For whatsoever creatures thou beholdest
Breathing the breath of life the same have been
Even from their earliest age preserved alive
By cunning or by valour, or at least
By speed of foot or wing And many a stock
Remaineth yet because of use to man
And so committed to man's guardianship
Valour hath saved alive fierce lion breeds
And many another terrorizing race,
Cunning the foxes flight the antlered stags
Light sleeping dogs with faithful heart in breast,
However and every kind begot from seed
Of beasts of draft as too the woolly flocks
And horned cattle all my Memmius
Have been committed to guardianship of men
For anxiously they fled the savage beasts

INTO being

The clouds condense, when in this upper space
Of the high heaven have gathered suddenly,
As round they flew, unnumbered particles—
World's rougher ones, which can, though interlinked
With scanty couplings, yet be fastened firm,
The one on other caught. These particles
First cause small clouds to form ; and, thereupon,
These catch the one on other and swarm in a flock
And grow by their conjoining, and by winds
Are borne along, along, until collects
The tempest fury. Happens, too, the nearer
The mountain summits neighbour to the sky,
The more unceasingly their far crags smoke
With the thick darkness of swart cloud, because
When first the mists do form, ere ever the eyes
Can there behold them (tenuous as they be),
The carrier-winds will drive them up and on
Unto the topmost summits of the mountain ;
And then at last it happens, when they be
In vaster throng upgathered, that they can
By this their condensation lie revealed,
And that at same time they are seen to surge
From very vertex of the mountain up
Into far ether. For very fact and feeling,
As we up-climb high mountains, proveth clear
That windy are those upward regions free.

(vi. 451-69, tr. Leonard.)

The last phenomenon of which Lucretius treats is the spread of epidemic disease, and so he is led to close the book and the poem with a description of the Great Plague at Athens, based fairly closely on the account given by the contemporary Greek historian, Thucydides. It is grim and gruesome, but it shows Lucretius' descriptive power in a new field.

SUCH form of malady, such deadly plague
In Cecrop's borders made all the fields
Full of the dead, wasted its ways of men,
And robbed its cities of inhabitants
At its first rising coming from the shore
Of Egypt, soon it covered a vast tract,
Of sky and ocean's watery plains, and fixed
Itself upon Pandion, there whole crowds
Were handed over to disease and death
There first of all they found the head was seized
With burning heat, their bloodshot eyes suffused
With tears that dimmed the sight the reddened throat
Within was moist with blood, the vocal chords
Were choked with ulcers, and the interpreter
Of mind, the tongue, was oozing out with gore,
Weak from disease, heavy, and rough to touch
When through the throat the evil reached the chest,
And its destroying force had gathered sore
Upon the heart, all sick with maladies,
Then all the bands of life became unloosed
Their breath rolled from the mouth in foetid streams,
As stinking corpses smell thrown out of doors
The mind itself with all its power and force,
The body too, were languishing away
On death's dark threshold, anxious despair
Accompanied their intolerable ills
And sad complaints and groans

(vi 1138-59, tr. Allison)

Lucretius died in 55 B.C. at the early age of 43. Few who know his poem well would fail to name it as the second, if not quite the greatest poem in Latin literature, and this is a proud claim to be made on behalf of a didactic poet, whose material must necessarily be to some extent intractable. From these extracts at least some idea may have been gained of his acuteness of reasoning, of his astounding power of description and the passionate force of his convictions.

With the brawny delver who tosseth and stirreth the earth to and fro.

Nay, men who will let slip no device of watchful care
Choose out betimes a place, and prepare them a nursery there
Of soil like that where the vines shall soon be orderly ranged,
Lest the babe-trees recognize not the mother suddenly changed.
Nay, even the quarters of heaven do men on the young bark score,
That, according as each tree faced, which side soever bore
The heat of the south, and turned its back to the northern pole,
So they might plant it, so potent is early habit's control.

(Georg. ii. 259-72, tr. Way.)

The conclusion of the Second Book must be quoted; for it seems to sum up all Virgil's aspirations as the poet of the country and to look forward to that era of peace, when the Italian shall again be a husbandman and lead his active pious life far removed from the intrigues of politics and the luxury of life in Rome.

ME before all things may the Muses sweet,
Whose rites I bear with mighty passion pierced,
Receive, and show the paths and stars of heaven,
The sun's eclipses and the labouring moons,
From whence the earthquake, by what power the seas
Swell from their depths, and, every barrier burst,
Sink back upon themselves, why winter-suns
So haste to dip 'neath ocean, or what check
The lingering night retards. But if to these High realms of nature the cold curdling blood
About my heart bar access, then be fields
And stream-washed vales my solace, let me love
Rivers and woods, inglorious. Oh, for you
Plains, and Spercheius, and Taygete,¹
By Spartan maids o'er-revelled! Oh, for one,
Would set me in deep dells of Haemus cool,
And shield me with his boughs' o'ershadowing might!

¹ Spercheius, the river of Sparta, and Taygete, the mountain which rises above Sparta.

Happy, who had the skill¹ to understand
 Nature's hid causes, and beneath his feet
 All terrors cast, and death's relentless doom,
 And the loud roar of greedy Acheron²
 Blest too is he who knows the rural gods
 Pan, old Silvanus and the sister nymphs !
 Him nor the rods of public power³ can bind,
 Nor kingly purple, nor fierce feud that drives
 Brother to turn on brother, nor descent
 Of Dacian from the Danube's leagu'd flood
 Nor Rome's great State, nor kingdoms like to die,
 Nor hath he grieved through pitying of the poor,
 Nor envied him that hath What fruit the boughs,
 And what the fields, of their own bounteous will
 Have borne he gathers, nor iron rule of laws,
 Nor maddened Forum have his eyes beheld,
 Nor archives of the people

(Georg. ii. 475-502, tr. Rhoades)

In the Third Book Virgil treats of the live stock on the farm, and possibly because the subject had a stronger attraction for him there is less digression here and stricter attention to business. The horses claim his attention first and we may take as typical a passage in which he describes with all the learning of a connoisseur the points in a stud horse, yet we may notice that observation and poetry never desert him.

FROM the first doth the foal of a high bred stock, as he Paceth the plains
 Lift high his feet, and he planteth on earth a springy limb
 Ever he leadeth the way for the rest no terrors for him
 Hath the threatening torrent, he trusteth himself to the untried bridge
 He is scared not at meaningless noises. His neck is a high arched ridge

¹ Happy who had the skill &c. an allusion to Lucretius

² Acheron a river of the lower world

³ rods of public power the emblems of office of the Roman magistrates

Clean-cut is his head, full-fleshed is his back, and his barrel short ;

His high-mettled chest is billowy with muscle. The comelier sort
Be the bay and the grey : of all coats worst be the dun and the white.

Once more, if from far away arms clash as in grapple of fight,
He cannot be still, pricks ears, his limbs are quivering,
From his nostrils the volumed breath like smoke from a fire doth he fling.

He tosseth a dense mane back o'er his rightward shoulder to sweep.

His spine is a valley between two ridges : his hoofs dint deep
The earth, and the solid horn wakes thunder at every leap.

Such Cyllarus was, who was tamed by the curb of Amyclae's king .
Pollux,¹ and they of whom the Grecian poets sing,
The chariot-pair of Mars, and mighty Achilles' team.

So likewise seemed fleet Saturn,² when over his neck to stream
He tossed his mane as his queen drew near, and, fleeing away,
Filled sky-encountering Pelion's glens with his clarion neigh.

(Georg. iii. 75-94, tr. Way.)

From horses the poet passes to cattle and is just as exact in his description of the points of the good cow and the qualities of different breeds. But a fine digression gives us a splendid description of the fight of two bulls :

IN Sila's depth fair heifer feeds at large ;
Headlong her suitors hurry to the charge,
With give and take, and wounds pell mell, and gore
Shed black upon their bodies ; as they lock
With tug and groans, horns shiver in the shock,
While woods and long Olympus echo back their roar.
No more the warriors share a common home,
But exiled far the vanquish'd bull must roam ;

¹ Pollux and Castor were the twin demigods of Greek legend, and Cyllarus their horse.

² Saturn is said to have disguised himself as a horse in order to conceal an amour with a nymph from his wife Rhea.

In foreign parts he groans o'er his disgrace,
The conqueror's blows who reigneth in his place
The love he lost for nothing and the grief
To see the last of his ancestral sief

For this he trains his muscle without stint,
And hets all night upon a bed of flint
He lives on hairy leaves, and reedy thorns
Lunges and learns to throw fire into his horns,
Jousting at trees and guding at the blast
Rehearses battle, with the sand upcast
Then rears his flap with pristine power as low
And dashes headlong on the oblivious foe

As when a wave rears white in the far deep,
And up the offing drags its volumed sweep
Then rolling landward roars through rocky walls,
And, big as the mountain's self, towers and falls:
Deep waters boil out from the whirl below,
And dash the black sand up the undertow.

(Georg. iii. 219-41, 1r Blackmore)

We may notice in this passage the evident sympathy with the defeated bull and the attribution of almost human feelings to him—very characteristic of Virgil—and also the magnificence of the comparison of his onrush to the advance of a wave at sea.

The last part of the book is devoted to the flocks, and the book concludes with a description of a great cattle plague which once raged in Italy. An extract from this may have an ad led interest in that the whole passage is modelled on Lucretius's description of the plague at Athens. Virgil is gruesome too, but we feel a more human touch: he is not the mere observer, but the sympathizer.

HIL RE from distempered heavens erewhile arose
A piteous season with the full fierce heat
Of autumn glowed and cattle-kindreds all
And all wild creatures to destruction gave,
Tainted the pools the fodder charged with bane
Nor simple was the way of death, but when

Hot thirst through every vein impelled had drawn
Their wretched limbs together, anon o'erflowed
A watery flux, and all their bones piecemeal
Sapped by corruption to itself absorbed.
Oft in mid sacrifice to heaven—the white
Wool-woven fillet half wreathed about his brow—
Some victim, standing by the altar, there
Betwixt the loitering carles a-dying fell :
Or, if betimes the slaughtering priest had struck,
Nor with its heap'd entrails blazed the pile,
Nor seer to seeker thence could answer yield ;
Nay, scarce the up-stabbing knife with blood was stained,
Scarce sullied with thin gore the surface-sand.
Hence die the calves in many a pasture fair,
Or at full cribs their lives' sweet breath resign ;
Hence on the fawning dog comes madness, hence
Racks the sick swine a gasping cough that chokes
With swelling at the jaws : the conquering steed,
Uncrowned of effort and heedless of the sword,
Faints, turns him from the springs, and paws the earth
With ceaseless hoof : low droop his ears, wherefrom
Bursts fitful sweat, a sweat that waxes cold
Upon the dying beast ; the skin is dry,
And rigidly repels the handler's touch.

(Georg. iii. 478-502, tr. Rhoades.)

The Fourth Book is devoted to bees—at first sight a disproportionate treatment of a subordinate subject, but we must remember that honey was more important in antiquity when it was the sole means of sweetening food. It is also clear that Virgil himself had a peculiar interest in bees, perhaps because in their organized community they presented very obviously that parallel to human life which we have already seen him tacitly seeking. An early passage in which he describes a fight between two swarms is a good example of this 'human' interest in the bees ; we may notice specially the irony and pathos of the last two lines.

BUT if they march to battle (for with two Cornival kings¹ tumultuous discords brew)
 At once 'tis easy to forecast afar
 The public mood, the hearts that pant to war
 The martial blare of metal chides the slack
 And voice that rings like jerking clarion's crack
 All of a hustle, hip and thigh, they close
 Flash wings, whet stings and square their arms to fence,
 And round their king, and own head quarters dense,
 Pell mell they trumpet challenge to the foes

At length a fine May day and fields at large,
 Out of the gates they burst, and then the charge!
 A shock to heaven they swirl in a great ball,
 They hug they fight, and headlong down they fall
 No thicker pours the hailstorm, nor so fast
 From shaken holm tree pelts the shower of mast
 The kings in thick of fight, outwing the rest,
 A giant spirit in a pigmy breast,
 So staunch, so dogged not to flinch, or ere
 The crushing victor routs them here and there

(Georg iv 67-87, tr Blackmore)

A brilliant passage describes the daily work of the hive, the distribution of labour and the co operation, which make the bees so like a human community

THEY only have children in common all homes of their city are one
 To the majesty of Law subjected their life-days run
 A fatherland and a settled home they only know
 They bethink them of coming winter, they toil through the summer glow,
 And all that they win for the general use lay by in store
 Some watch for the nation's subsistence, by covenant bound, evermore

¹ two kings the ancients always believed the leader of the swarm to be a king not a queen.

In the field some labour ; within the home's seclusion some Lay down the narcissus' tears and the tree-bark's viscid gum
For their honeycomb's first foundations, then hang therefrom in their place

The close-clinging wax of the cells. Some rear the hope of the race

To full growth : honey, of sweet things purest, do others store
Till with liquid nectar the straining cells are brimming o'er.
Some are there, to whom 'tis allotted to ward the gates of the town :

In turn do they watch for the rain and the heaven's cloud-knit frown :

They receive the harvester's burdens, they close in phalanx of war,

And they chase that thriftless rabble, the drones, from their precincts afar.

'Tis a fever of toil ; thyme-scented the odorous honey-drops are.
'Tis as when the Cyclopes¹ in haste from ingots tough red-glowing

Forge thunderbolts : some are indrawing the blast and anon outblowing

From the bellows of bull-hide : others are plunging the hissing brass

In the tank. Even Etna groans 'neath the anvil's ponderous mass.

Mightily swing they alternately up for the rhythmical blow
Their arms ; in the grip of the pincers the metal they turn to and fro.

Even so—if by giants' work we may set things small as these—
The gain-getter's passion inborn spurs on the Cecropian bees.

(Georg. iv. 153-77, tr. Way.)

Lastly we may quote a short passage in which Virgil, following the doctrine of the Stoic philosophy, suggests that the bees

¹ Cyclopes, the legendary smiths, giants, whose forge was beneath Etna.

have within them a spark of the divine mind which is their instinct. Here Virgil the most truly religious of Latin poets, shows us his deeper thoughts

LED by these tokens and with such traits to guide
 Some say that unto bees a share is given
 Of the Divine Intelligence and to drink
 Pure draughts of ether, for God permeates all—
 Earth and wide ocean and the vault of heaven—
 From whom flocks herds men beasts of every kind
 Draw each at birth the fine essential flame,
 Yea and that all things hence to Him return
 Brought back by dissolution nor can death
 Find place but each into his starry rank
 Alive they soar and mount the heights of heaven

(Georg. iv 219-27 tr Rhoades)

In Lucretius and Virgil Latin didactic poetry—and perhaps the didactic poetry of the world—reached its height and we might well leave it there. But there are three other poems which merit mention partly because they are typical of much not quite first-class work which was done in Rome. PUBLIUS OVIDIUS NASO (see also *Elegiac Poetry*¹ and *The Novel*²) invented a form of didactic poetry unique in Latin in his Fasts: a record in verse of the festivals of the old Roman Calendar. The poem is unfinished only the first six months of the year being completed. The main motive is antiquarian. Ovid attempts to account for the origin of the various ceremonies and customs and introduces for this purpose an odd jumble of philology aetiological explanation and Graeco-Roman legend often in dealing with the last he lets his passion for story telling have full play. But he was really interested in the subject and occasionally records a minute description of the ceremonial which is of great value to students of the old religion.

We may take two passages as typical. In the first Ovid imagines himself interrogating Janus the deity after whom January was named as to the custom of present giving at the beginning of the New Year and wishes to know the reason of the customary gift of a small coin

NOW why they money give, I fain would learn ;
For I no portion of your Feast would lose,
And never yet could find how this arose.

He smiling said, Oh ! skilled in tuneful rhymes,
More than in knowledge of these latter times,
To fancy gold less pleasing in perfume,
Less sweet to taste than honey from the comb ;
Even I, on earth while Saturn held his seat,
Saw scarcely one to whom gain was not sweet.
In time the appetite more fierce did grow,
Till farther it can scarcely find to go.
Wealth is more valued now than ere before,
When Rome was new, and all its people poor ;
When a small house the great Quirinus held,
Or some rank rush-bed gathered from the field ;
Jove in his fane could scarce his height display,
And brandished thunder made of potters' clay.
Leaves decked that Capitol which gems adorn,
And flocks were fed by senators at morn,
But when her head the City's Fortune reared,
And Rome among the supreme gods appeared,
Their wealth increased, wealth still they raging crave,
And when they have too much, more still would have.
Once they gave brass ; the omen now is gold.
And the new money supersedes the old.

(Fasti, i. 189 ff., tr. J. Taylor.)

In this passage we see besides a genuine antiquarian spirit something of Ovid's sly humour and something of his power of satire on the habits of his own times. In the second passage, which comes from a description of the rustic festival of the Palilia, we have an example of his careful observation of the details of ceremonial—also an attractive piece of description showing evident sympathy with the occupations of country life.

YOUR visits to the Virgin Altar make,
 Ye people all, and of its gifts partake !
 Each who will these receive with faithful heart,
 By Vesta's power shall purified depart
 A horse's blood, a calf burnt in the womb,
 And withered bean stalks, furnish the perfume
 Shepherd, with care your pregnant ewes survey,
 When to the fold they come at close of day,
 Sprinkling the water upon all around,
 From the wet bough,—then with it sweep the ground,
 Let leafy branches the sheep-pen embower,
 And festooned garlands decorate the door,
 From living sulphur let the flames aspire,
 And the sheep bleat, touched by the liquid fire
 Flame from male-olive and pine-torches raise,
 Let crackling laurels animate the blaze
 And saine herbs —for powers to these belong,
 Noxious to sheep, and to their unborn young,
 The millet cakes in numerous baskets bear,
 The Rustic Goddess loves that rustic fare.
 Bring her own curds and whey the milking pail,
 The savoury cheese in neat cut slices deal,
 And with warm milk that froths like foaming spray,
 To Pales Dweller of the Woodlands, pray
 Say then —protect the herd and herdsman too
 And may my cattle every harm eschew !
 Repel disease let men and flocks be strong
 Nor of our dogs forget the watchful throng !
 Bring back at night all who went forth at morn,
 Nor let me grieve for lambs that wolves have torn !
 Famine avert, give herbs and leaves in store,
 Water to drink, and bathe in evermore !
 Full be the udders of my ewes and cows,
 And cheese yield profit equal to my vows !
 May the sour runnet curds in plenty give,

And the clear whey flow through the chequered sieve !
 Strong be my rams, healthy their woolly mates,
 Whilst from the fold full many a lambkin bleats !
 Let the full fleeces in huge heaps expand,
 Soft, fine, and fit for tender maiden's hand !
 These things I pray for ; and that every year
 To Lady Pales I big cakes may bear !—
 By prayers like these the Goddess may be won ;
 Recite these thrice, facing the rising sun,
 And on your heads the living water pour,
 Bright as the dew that gems the opening flower ;
 Then from your cup, or skimming-dish, propine
 The snow-white milk and the mull'd purple wine ;
 And through the straw-heaped bonfire's crackling glow,
 With headlong leap your agile bodies throw.

(Fasti, iv. 731 ff., tr. J. Taylor.)

The poem of CAIUS MANILIUS, written during the reign of Augustus, was Alexandrian in motive and dealt with astronomy ; but with the astronomy it combined a superstitious astrology and a vague religious sense which lifts it out of the commonplace. Much of the poem is poor and almost mechanical, but here and there are passages which reach a much higher level.

We may take as an example of Manilius's style and subject a passage from an early English translation, which, if a little stilted, yet gives a fair idea of his manner. He is describing the birth of the world, and the rather elaborated and calculated style may be compared with the simpler and more effective narrative of Lucretius (p. 106).

NOW since from Heaven itself our Verse descends,
 And down to Earth Fate's settled Order tends,
 We first must Nature's General State rehearse,
 And draw the Picture of the Universe.
 We can but guess its Birth : obscured it lies
 Beyond the reach of Men and Deities.
 Yet though its Birth be hid, its Form's disclos'd,
 And in due Order all its Parts dispos'd ;

Fire up to the Aethereal Confines flew
 And a round Wall of Flame 'bout Nature drew
 The subtle Air posest the second Place
 Diffus'd throughout the vast Globe's middle Space
 Whence its hot Neighbour draws cool nourishment
 The third Lot level'd the wide Sea's Extent
 And in a liquid Plain the Waters spread
 Whence hungry Air is by thin Vapours fed
 Prest down its Sediment Earth lowest fell
 Whilst sand mixt slime contracting did expel
 The subtler moisture which to flight constrain'd
 Rose by degrees till it the surface gain'd
 And the more that into pure Water went
 The more the squeez'd out Seas the drain'd Earth pent
 Settling in hollow Vales whilst Hills thrust out
 Their Heads from Waves circling the Globe 'bout
 Thus lowest in the midst is still confin'd
 On all parts equally from Heaven disjoin'd
 Secur'd from further falling by its fall
 The Middle both and Bottom of this All
 And did not Earth by its self Poize suspend
 Phoebus the Stars approaching could not bend
 His Course to set nor set ere rise again
 Nor Phoebe drive through the Aereal plain
 Her Wave drenched Steeds nor Phosphorus the Light
 Ere usher more if Hesperus to Night

(Astronomicon i 118-25 147-78 tr Sherburne)

Lastly there is a mysterious poem called the Aetna. It used to be placed among the minor works of Virgil but though all critics would now agree that it is not Virgil's there is still much dispute as to its date and authorship some claiming it as the work of an Augustan poet others placing it much later some would indeed assign it to Seneca's pupil Lucius Junius and therefore to the reign of Nero. It is an attempt rather in the manner of the sixth book of Lucretius to account for the phenomena of volcanoes which it does by strange and elaborate theories of subterranean winds. One passage will suffice to show its quality. It is of general character and deals rather sententiously with the mission of science, arguing that it is just as important that men should investigate the phenomena of earth as the mysteries of the sky.

NOT with the eyes alone like sheep to gaze
 On wonders, or with belly prone on earth
 To feed the heavy limbs in listless ease,
 But to learn nature's secrets and to seek
 Her hidden laws ; to consecrate the mind,
 To raise the head to heaven and to know
 The fateful elements of the mighty world
 —Whether they fear an end or live for aye
 With firm frame moored by an eternal chain—
 To know the sun's course and the lesser orb
 The moon doth twelve times tread in his one year,
 Which stars on track predestin'd run and which Erratic¹ move at their unfetter'd will ;
 Nor all the wondrous things of this great world
 To leave confused in undigested mass,
 But to mark each one by its several signs
 And set in sure array each marvel learnt—
 This is the soul's supreme and godlike joy.
 Yet 'tis an earlier task to know the earth
 And mark what wonders nature works therein :
 For earth is closer kin to man than sky.
 What greater madness can a mortal seize
 Than wand'ring in Jove's realm to seek the stars
 And leave neglected marvels at his feet ?

(Aetna, 224-34, 248-57.)

Perhaps direct instruction is not really a fruitful theme for poetry, but in Latin amid much second-rate work it has at least given us two of the greatest poems in the language.

¹ i.e. the planets.

ELEGIAC

THE Elegiac couplet consists of the heroic hexameter followed by a line of five feet, a pentameter, divided into halves each of two and a half feet. It is well illustrated by the imitative lines

In the hexameter rises the fountain's silvery column,
In the pentameter aye falling in melody back.

Traditionally the metre was regarded as fitted for lamentations, and the name interpreted as 'Say "alas!"' But we first find it used in Greek to express warlike enthusiasm, by Callinus of Ephesus (eighth century B.C.?) and Tyrtæus of Sparta (seventh century), though Archilochus of Paros more noted for his iambs, seems to have employed it in duges. Solon, the great Athenian reformer, used this metre for writing of his political exploits while later in the sixth century Theognis of Megara and Phocylides of Miletus wrote proverbs in the same strain. Pírges of Halicarnassus is credited with interpolating a pentameter after each hexameter in the Iliad, but it was Mimermus of Colophon (see Pageant of Greece, p. 83) who associated elegy notably with love, and his example was followed by the Alexandrians, Antimachus of Colophon, Philetas (one of Propertius's models, and perhaps not without influence on Tibullus), Hermesianax, Euphorion, and Callimachus (who had his effect on Propertius and Ovid as well as Catullus). Throughout later Greek literature this form was used for epigrams especially for inscriptions on tombs or votive offerings (see Pageant of Greece pp. 384-94).

The earliest Latin Elegiacs we possess are some epitaphs, of which the two following are attributed to ENNIUS (see also pp. 18 ff., 174 ff., 282)

On Scipio Africanus, conqueror of Hannibal

Here lieth one to whom nor friend nor foe
Could for his deeds a fit requital show

On himself

No meed of tears nor wailing funeral give
I fly upon the lips of men and live

By some unknown author :

Epitaph of Cornelius Scipio Hispallus, praetor 139 B.C.

I by my life increased my race's worth,
 Offspring begot, my father's deeds ensued,
 My forbears' praise secured, approved my birth,
 My stock with lustre of high rank endued.

The epigrams of QUINTUS LUTATIUS CATULUS (consul 102 B.C., and, with Marius, victor in the wars with the Cimbri) show an adaptation of the Greek use ; the first imitates Callimachus :

I

MY soul has fled ; it has perhaps with Theotimus hid ;
 It often does. Yes, so it has ; it's sheltering there no doubt.

What, shameless soul and shameless host ! what, did I not forbid

That runaway to be let in, nay, bid him be thrown out ?

We'll go and look. Yet sore indeed we fear lest in a trice Ourselves be caught. What can we do ? Venus, what's your advice ?

II

Greeting Aurora's rising I did stand :

Sudden doth Roscius rise on my left hand.

Gods, with your favour, I've presum'd to see

A mortal fairer than a Deitie. (tr. Lovelace.)

CATULLUS¹ used the metre for love poems and for personal attacks ; many of his best poems will be found translated in the section on Lyric and Occasional Verse. Here may be given extracts, one showing an appreciation of mountain scenery, the other dealing with the eternal problem of the aspirate :

AS gushing from the airy mountain steeps
 Springs the bright torrent from a mossy rock,
 And tumbles down the vale in headlong leaps
 Across the roadway where the people flock,
 And cools the weary wayfarer a-thirst
 When the hot sun makes the burnt furrows burst ;

¹ See pp. 21, 62 ff.

Or as to seaman tossed in pitchy squall
 There comes a softer favouring wind, when he Doth now on Castor, now on Pollux call,
 Such was the help of Allius to me (lxviii 57, tr. Marns)

'H ADVANTAGE' was what Arry used to say.
 'Hambush' for 'ambush' was his regular way
 He thought his own pronouncing best on earth—
 To asprate 'hambush' all that he was worth
 His mother so pronounced so did her brother
 His mother's father likewise his grandmother
 Arry was sent abroad our ears had rest
 We heard the same words tenderly caressed,
 Nor thought again to hear such aspiration—
 When sudden came the *h*awful *h*information
 The 'Ionian' waves since Arry's tour were lost,
 Hinto the igh seas of 'Ilionia' tossed!

(lxxxiv tr. Wight Duff Rulers of Rome, p. 34)

In 70 B.C. were born Cornelius Gallus and Virgil. Gallus is usually regarded as the earliest of those who made Latin elegy an independent province of literature. He wrote four books concerning his mistress Lycoris, we have none of this work. Quintilian observes that his style was 'harsher' than that of his successors. There survives a short elegiac poem entitled 'The Barmaid' which has been attributed to VIRGIL¹ and may possibly be an early work of his.

THE Syrian Girl who haunts the taverns round
 Her forehead with a Greek tiara bound
 Expert in dance her pliant sides to twine
 With sound of castanets now reels with wine
 Why should it please to plod our weary way
 Through cloudy dust in summer's scorching day?
 Here the bower'd walk a breezy cool entwines
 And chequer'd shadows fall from arching vines.
 Pour'd from pitch'd cask the new-drawn wine runs clear,
 A brook in brawling murmurs gurgles near

¹ See pp. 22 ff. 84 112 ff. 212 ff.

Come Calybita ! scarce your ass can bear
 The sweating heat : your four-foot favourite spare.
 Now with shrill note cicadas rend the brakes,
 Now in cool haunt his heat the lizard slakes.
 Come—panting rest beneath the vine-leaf shade ;
 Your languid head with rosy fillet braid ;
 Ravish the soft lips of that Syrian fair :
 A mischief on the man with brows of care !
 Why for ungrateful dust reserve the flower ?
 Why for a grave-stone pluck the fragrant bower ?
 Bring wine ; bring dice ; avaunt to-morrow's doom !
 Death twitches now our ears, and ' live ! ' he cries ; ' I come !'
 (tr. Elton.)

Quintilian gives the palm for finish and elegance to TIBULLUS (c. 55-19 B.C.). This poet celebrates two mistresses, Delia and Nemesis. His tastes are for the country ; he loathes war ; simple contentment alternates in his poems with gentle melancholy ; his lines are delicate, winsome, and lucid. The following poems describe his ideals :

THEIR piles of golden ore let others heap,
 And hold their countless roods of cultured soil,
 Whom neighbouring foes in constant terror keep—
 The weary victims of unceasing toil.
 Let clang of arms and trumpet's blast dispel
 The balmy sleep their hearts in vain desire ;
 At home in poverty and ease I'd dwell,
 My hearth aye gleaming with a cheerful fire.
 Nor let me blush to wield at times the rake,
 Or with the goad the laggard oxen ply ;
 The straggling lamb within my bosom take,
 Or kid, by heedless dam left lone to die.
 The lone stump in the field I still revere,
 Or ancient stone whence flowery garlands nod,
 In cross-roads set : the first-fruits of the year
 I duly offer to the peasant's god.

Then smile, ye gods ! nor view with high disdain
The frugal gifts clean earthen bowls convey ,
Such earthen vessels earst the ancient swain
Moulded and fashioned from the plastic clay
The wealth and harvest-stores my sires possessed
I covet not few sheaves will yield me bread ,
Enough, reclining on my couch to rest
And stretch my limbs upon the wonted bed
How sweet to lie and hear the wild winds roar
To clasp my love safe to my gentle breast
Or, when the cold South's sleety torrents pour
Lulled by the rain to sink secure to rest !
This lot be mine let him be rich, 'tis fair,
Who braves the wrathful sea and tempests drear
Oh, rather perish gold and gems than e'er
One fair one for my absence shed a tear !
Delia, I court not praise, if mine thou be ,
Let men cry loud and clown, I'll bear the brand ,
In my last moments let me gaze on thee,
And dying, clasp thee with my faltering hand !
Nor only thou wilt weep , no youth, no maid,
With tearless eye will from my tomb repair
But, Delia, vex not thou thy lover's shade ,
Thy tender cheeks, thy streaming tresses spare !
Too soon will Death be here with shroud of shade
Let us be one in love while Fates allow ,
Dull age creeps on the joys of youth and maid
And Love's soft speech ill suit a hoary brow.

(1 x, tr Cranstoun)

I 'M dragged to war, and now, perchance some foe Bears the dread shaft that's doomed to pierce my side ,
Save ! ye paternal gods who watched me grow
And play about your feet in infant pride

Then ye were pleased when wine before you flowed,
 Or wheaten garland girt your holy brow ;
 The swain gave cakes, his little girl bestowed
 Pure honeycomb, when ye had heard his vow.
 Ah me ! why court dark death in war ? all round
 It creeps unseen and silent, ever near :
 Below, no crops—no vines—but the fierce hound
 And the grim boatman of the Stygian mere.
 And there with half-burnt hair and sunken cheeks
 By the dark lake the wan-faced tenants roam ;
 Far happier he whom tardy old age seeks
 Among his children in a humble home.
 In peace grow bright the mattock and the share,
 While rust in darkness rots the warriors arms—
 The jolly swains from groves in waggons bear
 Their wives and children back to smiling farms.
 Then 'tis Love's wars that rage ; her tresses rent
 The maiden mourns, and weeps o'er broken doors,
 And tender cheeks all bruised, till penitent
 The victor his mad strength of hand deplores.
 In wanton ease between the angry pair
 Sits Love, and with ill words the feud supplies ;
 Ah ! steel and stone the man who'd strike the fair ;
 This is to drag the gods down from the skies.
 Enough, if he should tear her silken vest,
 Or spoil the wreaths that round her tresses creep,
 Or move her heart to tears : oh ! four times blest
 Is he whose ire can make a maiden weep !

(i. 10, tr. Cranstoun.)

HIS wife will bear a son to crown his bliss ;
 Grasping his father's ears he'll snatch a kiss ;
 Nor will the grandsire grudge to tend the boy,
 For all his years prattling with childish joy.

(ii. 5, tr. Cranstoun.)

Tibullus has given us an idyllic description of the country festival of the Ambarvalia or Lustration of the Fields (for a prose account of the scene it is worth while to turn to Pater's Marius the Epicurean)

ATTEND! and favour! as our Sires ordain
 The Fields we lustrate and the rising Grain
 This hallow'd Day suspend each Swain his Toil
 Rest let the Plough and rest th' uncultur'd Soil
 Unyoke the Steer his Racks heap high with Hay
 And deck with Wreaths his honest Front to-day
 Let all to Heaven's Service be apply'd!
 And lay ye thrifty Fair your Wool aside!

See! to the Flames the Victim comes unbound!
 Follows the white Procession Olive-crown'd!

To-day we purge the Farmer and the Field
 From Ills O sylvan Gods our Limits shield
 O let no Weeds destroy the rising Grain
 By no swift Wolf be the weak Lambkin slain
 Prosperous the Hind shall trust the teeming Earth
 And heap great Logs upon his blazing Hearth

Wine in our Festival its Part must play
 The tipsy Reel causes no shame To-day

Sport on! Night yokes her Steeds a golden Train
 Follows in playful Dance the Mother's Wane
 Then Sleep comes silent swathed in Wings of black
 And the vain Race of Dreams flits in his Track

(in i tr Grainger)

Tibullus exhibits a certain mild enthusiasm for the deeds of his patron Messalla and for the greatness of Rome

GRAZE on the seven green mountain sides ye bullocks while ye may
 For a mighty city soon will crown the slopes ye tread to-day

Rome that shall rule th' e nations all—the stern decree is given—

Where'er on her fields glad Ceres looks from the azure heights of Heaven,

From where the sun at dawn of day leaveth his rosy pillow,
To where he laves his panting steeds in the Ocean-stream's cold billow. (ii. 5. 55, tr. Cranstoun.)

In love Tibullus shows sometimes a subdued desperation, sometimes a simple ardour. Nemesis was rapacious as well as fickle, but Tibullus is too tender and loyal to threaten for long, and indeed too sincere to pretend that he can hold out :

BE chaste my love, and let thine old nurse e'er,
To keep thine honour pure, around thee tread,
Tell thee sweet tales, and, by the lamp's bright glare,
From the full distaff draw the lengthening thread.

And when thy maidens, spinning round thy knee,

Sleep-worn, by slow degrees their work lay by,

Oh, let me speed unheralded to thee,

As though the gods had sent me from the sky !

Just as thou art, with ruffled locks astream,

And feet bare, run to meet me on my way !

Aurora ! goddess of the morning beam !

Bear, on thy rosy steeds, that happy day !

(i. 3, tr. Cranstoun.)

TO feel these racking tortures never more,

A stone on icy mountain-peak I'd be,

Or rise a rock where raving tempests roar,

Lashed by the breakers of the wrecking sea !

Now drear is day : more drear night's shadows throng ;

The hours are steeped in gall—her heart no bland,

Sweet elegy can move—no power of song :

Gold she demands with outstretched hollow hand.

I seek sweet access to my love in song ;

Ye Muses hence ! if strains avail no more :

Gold I must have by slaughter or by wrong,

Or lie in tears before her bolted door.

'Tis foreign gauds have spoiled the artless fair
 Hence bolted doors and surly dogs have come
 But bring an ample bribe no guard is there—
 No key withstands the very dog is dumb
 But the true generous maid though old in years
 Shall be bewailed before the burning pile
 And some old love revering lover will
 With annual wreaths her pillared tomb array
 And say departing Rest thee well and still Light lie the earth upon thy peaceful clay
 Truth prompts my words but what does that avail?
 Stern are HER laws and they must now be mine
 My dear ancestral home I'll set to sale—
 My household gods my all for HER resign.
 Weird Circe's draughts drugs of the Colchian queen¹—
 What herbs in Thessaly grow rank and tall—
 If Nemesis will only smile serene
 And mix a thousand more I'll drink them all

(u 4 tr Cranstoun)

N E ER to return to her how oft I swore
 But of itself my Foot returned once more
 Ere now in Death would I have ended Sorrow
 Hope ever bids expect a happier Morrow
 Hope feeds the Swain to Furrows trusts the Corn
 Soon with great Usury from Earth reborn
 By Hope the fetter'd Slave some Comfort gains
 Sings at his Work forgets his clanking Chains
 Hope promised you you haughty still deny
 Yield to the Goddess cruel Fair! comply
 Untimely Fate your Sister snatch'd away
 Spare me O spare me by her Shade I pray!
 Let her sleep well beneath the gentle Clay!
 Else wet with Tears shall Garlands deck her Tomb
 To her dumb Ashes will I weep my Doom

The Colchian queen is Medea

No more! My Lady's bitter Grief recurs,
 Those speaking Eyes upwelling Sorrow blurs;
 I am not worth a single Tear of hers.

(ii. 6, tr. Grainger.)

Tibullus and Virgil both died in 19 B.C. DOMITIUS MARSUS, an elegist who survived them, wrote this epitaph:

THEE too, Tibullus, ere thy time hath Death's unfeeling hand
 Dispatched to fare by Virgil's side to dim Elysium's land,
 That none should be to plain of love in elegy's soft lay
 Or in heroic numbers sweep with princes to the fray.

(tr. J. P. Postgate.)

Usually printed as the third book of Tibullus, there survive elegies by various poets, probably of the circle of Messalla. A certain Lygdamus (whom some identify with the freedman of Propertius, cf. p. 147) celebrates his love for Neaera. First comes the dedication, a dialogue with the Muses:

THY festal Calends, Roman Mars, are here,
 Which to our ancestors began the year;
 Presents in order due speed up and down
 Among the streets and houses of the town.
 Muses, what tribute shall Neaera cheer—
 Neaera, dear if mine, if false, still dear?
 'Beauty by song is won, and greed by gold;
 New, worthy verses to her joy unfold.'
 Go to her home, the dainty book bestow,
 Allow no bloom away from it to flow.
 She'll tell if her love's still as mine, or wanes,
 Or if her heart no thought of me retains.
 First give her lavish greeting, as is meet,
 And speak these words in accents soft and sweet;
 'Thy brother now, thy husband that would be,
 These humble gifts—accept them—sends to thee.
 Dearer to him thou art, he swears, than life,
 Whether to him thou'lt sister be or wife.

Better his wife hope of this name he ll save
Till death shall bear him unto Hell s wan wave

(Tib iii 1)

Lygdamus could describe beauty beautifully as witness these pictures of his lady and of a youth who appeared to him in a dream

ON thy Calends hath my Ladye robed to pay thee honour due
Come if thou be wise great Mayors come thyself her charms to view !

Venus will excuse the treason but do thou rude chief beware
Lest thine arms fall in dishonour whilst thou gazest on the fair
In her eyes whene er her pleasure wills the hearts of gods to fire
Lamps a pretty pair are burning ever lit by young Desire
Whatsoc er the maid be doing wheresoc er her step she bends
Perfect grace is shed around her perfect grace in stealth attends
Every heart is fired to see her walk she robed in purple bright
Every heart is fired to see her come she dressed in snowy white
If she leave her tresses flowing grace o er flowing locks is pour d
If she braid them in her braidings is she meet to be adored

(Tib iii 8 tr A Holmes)

NO fairer form was ever seen by man in days of yore
No home of heroes ever nursed a lovelier son before
Down his long neck played locks in ringlets all unshorn
while breathed

Of dripping Syrian dew those locks with myrtle interwreathed
Face fair as Luna s—colour as snow a gleam with purple light
Like blush upon the bride s soft cheek when the bridegroom meets her sight

Like amaranths mong lilies white which maiden hands have twined

Like as when Autumn ruddies o er the apple s waxen rind

(Tib iii 4 tr Cranstoun)

Except that Lygdamus aspires to lawful marriage, his ideals are much like those of Tibullus :

THAT through the lengthening years joys ever might
 Be ours in unison vows I did pay :
 That, pillowed on thy lap, in age's night
 I might at last serenely pass away ;
 When, measured out life's all of flickering light,
 My naked spirit must o'er Lethe stray.

(Tib. iii. 3, tr. Cranstoun.)

At the end of the book are some poems of Cerinthus (perhaps to be identified with Cornutus, a friend addressed by Tibullus in two poems) and of SULPICIA, the niece of Messalla (?). The lady exhibits a sincerity more frank than modest :

YES : love has come ; and, sooth, 'twould be more shame
 Blushing to veil it o'er, than tell my flame.
 Love's queen has heard my Muses' fond request,
 And brought and laid my lover on my breast.
 O transport ! of my joys make those a list
 Of whom 'tis said that they their own have missed.
 To no sealed tablets would I trust my joy,
 Lest any read my thoughts before my boy.
 I love my fault ; I loathe to mask for fame ;
 He's worthy of me, I of him the same.

(Tib. iii. 13.)

SEXTUS PROPERTIUS (c. 50-16 B.C.) may be regarded as the greatest poet of the three great elegists. His power of imagination and his depth of passion approach those of Catullus, but he lacks clarity and sustained excellence, and sometimes obtrudes his learning. Some of his lines are unforgettable, and he avoids Ovidian regularity in the couplet, so that the pentameter often is the culmination of his thoughts, rather than a subsidence from the dignity of the hexameter. He is a man of moods ; he reacts from triumph to melancholy ; he can pass from delicate romanticism to scurrilous abuse or to realistic sketches of low life. There is a lack of restraint in feeling and in language, which is at the same time a cause of weakness and of power. His great inspiration was the woman he called Cynthia she was of the type of Catullus's Lesbia though without her influence in political life Of her he truly says

Cynthia was first Cynthia shall be the end

The poet gives an account of his tastes in beauty and how she exemplified or defied them

'TWAS not her face though fair so smote my eye (Less fair the hly than my love as snows
 Of Scythia with Iberian vermil vie
 As float in milk the petals of the rose)
 Nor locks that down her neck of ivory stream
 Nor eyes—my stars—twin lamps with love aglow
 Nor if in silk of Araby she gleam
 (I prize not baubles) does she thrill me so
 As when she leaves the mantling cup to thread
 The mazy dance and moves before my view
 Graceful as blooming Ariadne led
 The choral revels of the Bacchic crew
 Or wakes the lute-strings with Aeolian quill
 To music worthy of the immortal Nine¹
 And challenges renowned Corinna's skill
 And rates her own above Erinna's line
 I marvelled once that Troywards Helen's eyes
 Drew Europe's might and Asia's martial pride
 Thou Paris Menelaus thou wert wise
 Thou quick to claim—thou loath to lose thy bride
 For one so fair Achilles well might die
 For her e'en Priam must have sanctioned arms
 But he who'd all of pictured Eld outvie
 Should paint my darling in her native charms
 To West to East her likeness let him show—
 Twill set the East twill set the West aglow

(1 3 tr Cranstoun)

¹ I.e. the Muses.

WHY to walk forth, sweet life, thy tresses braid?
 Why in the Coan garb's thin folds array'd?
 Why with Orontes' myrrh imbue thy hair?
 Thy beauty's price enhance by foreign ware?
 Trust me, thy face wants no cosmetic's aid;
 Love's naked god abhors the dressing trade:
 O mark what hues the lovely earth displays,
 How of themselves best climb the ivy-sprays,
 How in lone caves arbutus lovelier grows,
 Through untaught channels how the streamlet flows;
 The beach beguiles us gemmed with native stones,
 Sweeter for lack of art the wild bird's tones.

(ii. 2, tr. Nott.)

From the first his mistress kept the poet in fear of rivals. He indulged in a somewhat noisy outburst of triumph when she finally refused to go with a praetor to Illyria:

SHE'LL stay; she's sworn she will not go: ye envious, burst with spleen!
 My pleadings and unwearied prayers have won me back my queen.

To her I'm dear, and Rome she calls earth's dearest spot, for me,

And, from my side, she'd scorn the pride and pomp of royalty;
 With me she's ne'er been covetous, nor fled my circling arms,

Won by nor gold nor Indian pearls, but by song's gentle charms.
 Apollo's then a lover's aid, and maids of might the Nine;
 Now I can tread heaven's starry floor—by day, by night she's mine:

My rival cannot lure my love to break her plighted vow;
 This glory, 'mid the snows of age, will mantle round my brow.

(i. 8, tr. Cranstoun.)

Sometimes it is the thought of death that saddens the poet, as in these 'professions of unalterable attachment' (Nott):

CYNTHIA I dread not now the dreary tomb
 Nor on the pyre to pay the debt of doom
 But lest perchance thy love should die with me
 This fear is worse than death itself can be Among shades I'll thine be called for evermore
 Great love overpasses even the fatal shore
 And though thou liv'st through long and weary years
 Yet shall thy dust be greeted by my tears
 Oh might thy lifelong love mine ashes bless!
 Then death were rest of all its bitterness
 Yet how I fear my tomb thou'lt disregard
 And Love estrange thy heart—for Love is hard—
 And sternly make thee dry the trickling tear!
 His ceaseless threats make truest maidens veer
 So while we may love's pleasures let us prove Eternity is all too brief for love

(119 fr Cranstoun)

Even one of his most triumphant poems over sensual delight ends on a note of gloom

O BLISS! O dazzling night! O couch thrice dear
 From love-delights that all past joys outshone!
 What charming prattle when the lamp burnt clear!
 What loving dalliance when the light was gone!
 While fate allows let love delight our eye
 A long night comes and no returning day
 Oh would that Love around us both might twine
 A clasping chain that would endure for aye!
 Be doves our model whom love's bonds retain
 Who each with each are utterly made one
 He errs who seeks love's frenzy to restrain
 No bounds are set where true love's course we run
 Sooner shall earth with false fruit mock the swain
 Sun drive Night's steeds the rivers backward flow
 Than I to other mud transfer love's pain
 Hers will I be in life and hers below

If nights like this she grant me e'er again,
 A single year will be an age to me ;
 If many such, I'll be immortal then ;
 E'en one gives mortal immortality.
 Were Love and Wine life's work, nor ships, nor swords,
 Nor bones by Actian billows tost we'd rue ;
 Leave not life's joys while yet the light affords ;
 A world of kisses is a world too few.
 For as the leaves from withered garlands fall
 And scattering float in cups, so we, who bloom
 In love to-day, to-morrow may be thrall
 To ruthless fate, and prisoned in the tomb.

(ii. 15, tr. Cranstoun.)

His expressions of optimism are transient :

HIS fated death none but the lover knows,
 He fears not arms, nor any wind that blows.
 Though 'mid the Stygian reeds he sit afloat,
 And watch the dismal sails of Charon's boat,
 Let whisper of his girl's cry call him back,
 He will retrace the unpermitted track.

(ii. 27.)

A little allegory suggests by its playful tone that Propertius when he wrote it was ceasing to take his love so seriously :

MY love, as I was roaming late at night,
 Wine-flushed, with not a slave to guide my way,
 A group of urchins met me in my plight—
 How many there might be I cannot say.
 They all were naked. One, more rude than all,
 Cried ' Seize him ! Well you know him ! He 's the dunce
 The angry woman hired us to bemaule.'
 He spoke ; a rope was round my neck at once.
 One bids him drag me forth ; another shouts,
 ' Hang him ! He thinks we are not gods ! Ho there !

She's waited hours for you, you lout of louts!

And you, the while, are staggering heaven knows where Spare, brothers, spare, he swears he'll now be true

And lo! unto the very door we've come!

My stripped-off garment then they round me threw,

And said, 'Go, learn to spend your nights at home.'

(ii. 29, tr. Cranstoun.)

His curses upon rivals or bawds are vigorous but sometimes quaint rather than savage

WITH thee, or with my rivals for thee war
Trueless! No peace for me when thou art near!
Rejoice no longer maiden dost thy star

Else wouldst thou grieve thou'rt Queen of Beauty here

And as for thee who wouldst my girl ensnare,

By thy wife's sire and mother be thou haunted!

If one night's stolen bliss has been thy share,

In wrath 'gainst me, not love for thee, 'twas granted

(iii. 8, tr. Cranstoun.)

EARTH clothe thy tomb, foul bawd, with thorns around,
And may thy shade the thirst thou loatest bear.

Thy spirit rest not and the avenging hound

Thy mouldering bones with hungry growlings scare!

She willed—the magnet steel no more could draw,

The birds turned cruel, did their nestlings slay

She plied her task with flattery as doth bore

Through stony ground the patient mole its way

Place an old crumbling jar above her bones,

Crush it, wild fig-trees with what force ye can,

Ye lovers, pelt her tomb with jagged stones

And as ye pelt it curse the harridan

(iv. 5, tr. Cranstoun.)

His renunciation of Cynthia reminds us of the farewells of Catullus to Lesbia:

Not with her hair in neat array, but beautiful in rage
She thrusts her wrathful nails in Phyllis' face; while, wan with fear,

Loud Teia shouts, ' Help, murder, fire I bring water quickly here.'
And when she'd tired her arms and wreaked her vengeance to the dregs,

Poor waiter Lygdamus, who'd hid beneath the sofa's legs,
Is trundled out, and humbly sues for aid on bended knee
' Poor Soul ' I cried, ' 'tis vain, I'm but a captive here with thee '

With suppliant hands I begged for peace, and, moved by slow degrees,

She proudly smiled to see me bend beneath her stern decrees
(iv 8, tr. Cranstoun)

Yet he allows the ghost of Cynthia to prophesy that death will make them one again

SO there are spirits, then death ends not all,
But each wan ghost escapes the fiery pall,
For o'er my bed, methought, hung Cynthia's shade,
Though Cynthia in her wayside tomb was laid
Her bony fingers rattled in mine ear,
Though was her wrath still warm her accents clear
' False wretch and false to others yet to be
What power can sleep possess to solace thee?
Yet though I might, I blame thee not, mine own,
Long in thy poems have I reigned alone
I loved thee too if not let vipers come,
To twine my bones and hiss above my tomb
Burn every lay, each book that bears my name,
No more to Cynthia's beauty owe thy fame
And where soft apple-blossoms shade the stream,
And Anio's god bids bright the ivory gleam,
Set stone and write an epitaph to me,
Yet brief, that hasty travellers may see,

"In Tibur's earth here golden Cynthia lies,
 New praise boasts Anio for so rare a prize."
 By night we walk—night opes our prison-home,
 Unlocks the hell-hound's bar, and bids him roam;
 But back to Lethe's lake at dawn we fare,
 And the grim ferryman recounts us there.
 Another's now, ere long must thou be mine,
 And bone with bone in grinding clasp shall twine.'

(iv. 7, tr. Moore.)

Propertius, like the other elegists, pronounced his dislike of war and business; the pictures he draws speak louder than argument:

SOLDIER from Tuscan ramparts wounded,¹ why,
 When thou thy comrades' fate dost seek to fly,
 At my groans turn'st thou swollen eyes to me,
 Who lately shared the toils of war with thee?
 Save thee, and joy to thy glad parents bear,
 Nor to my sister let thy tears declare
 That Gallus, 'scaped from Caesar's hostile bands,
 Could not escape a nameless spoiler's hands;
 So if on Tuscan hills some bones she see
 She should not know those bones belonged to me.

(i. 21, tr. Cranstoun.)

SO, money, 'tis from thee life's troubles spring!
 Through thee before our time death's path we tread;
 To human vices sternly pandering,
 Of cares the fosterer and fountain-head!
 Thou whelmedst Paetus in the raging tide,
 What time to Pharian² ports he sailed away;

¹ Lucius, brother of Marcus Antonius, stirred up war against Octavian in 41 B.C., and was defeated at Perusia in Etruria, probably not far from the native place of Propertius, who represents his kinsman Gallus as speaking.

² Pharos was the lighthouse of Alexandria.

For, following thee he sank in youth's first pride
And now he floats, to distant fish a prey
No mother there earth's holy dues could pay
Or lay with kindred dust the last of thee,
Now o'er thy bones the sea birds linger aye
For tomb thou hast the whole Carpathian sea
Can anchor hold whom home has failed to keep?
What merits he who can his land despise?
The winds will all thy gains and treasures reap
No ship grows old the very harbour lies
To snare the trader Nature smoothed the main
Thou art lucky if but once success be thine
Caphareus dashed the conquering prows in twain¹
When reeled wrecked Greece athwart the trackless brine
But if, content to plough his father's field,
Paetus had weighed my words of warning well
His roof tree now a welcome guest would shield
Poor, but on land unswept by tempest fell
Out by the roots his nails by waves were torn,
With gasping mouth he gulped the hateful brine,
On one small plank drear night beheld him borne
To crush him did so many ills combine
With tears he poured this plaint—his latest prayer—
Ere the dark billow choked his dying breath
'Ye dread Aegean gods! ye winds of air!
And waves that downward drag my head to death!
Ye tides! O bear me to Italia's shore,
Enough if but my mother find my clay
Sucked down by eddying waves he spake no more—
These his last words and that his latest day
North wind against my sails thou ne'er shalt roar,
Adventuring naught I'll lie at Cynthia's door

(iii 7 tr Cranstoun)

Caphareus was a promontory in Euboea where the Greek fleet was wrecked after the Trojan war

Propertius has painted one fairy picture which shows the treatment of mythology at its best, and in unwonted restraint suggests Greek ideals. He tells how Heracles lost Hylas during the voyage of the Argonauts :

THE unconquered hero's favourite onward sped
To seek a far-secluded fountain-head
Him the twin-brothers, Boreas'¹ wingèd brood,
Zetes and Calais eagerly pursued—
Strove on poised wings his upturned face to kiss
And fled alternate with the ravished bliss :
Now hid he 'neath their wings upraised in air,
And with a bough drove off the wily pair.
Soon Orithyia's sons let Hylas roam :
Ah woe ! he sought, ah ! sought the wood-nymphs' home.
Over a spring dew-nurtured apples smiled
On trees untended in the woodland wild ;
Around the watered mead white lilies grew,
With poppies intermixed of scarlet hue.
With tender nail he culls them, happy boy !
His task forgot—a flower his only joy.
Now o'er the fount the reckless youth delays,
And in the glassy pool his form surveys ;
Now dips his urn to fill it to the brim,
His right arm leaning on the mossy rim.
That snowy shoulder then the Naiads fired :
They left their dances, and his charms admired ;
Then gently drew him down the yielding wave,
As prone he bent—a scream poor Hylas gave.
Afar Alcides answered, but there came
From the far founts nought save the echoed name.

(i. 20, tr. Cranstoun.)

Propertius wrote two imaginative addresses of wives to husbands, of which the first may have suggested to Ovid the form of his Heroides, while the second deals with historical characters :

¹ Boreas, the North wind, carried off the Athenian princess, Orithyia.

TO my Lycotas now I send this line,
 If one so oft away can still be mine
 Is this the bridal joy thou vow'dst to me,
 When first I yielded my young love to thee?
 On all the gates the gods my vows have spurned,
 Four cloaks I've woven, and thou st not returned
 They say thou'rt thin and pale—O may thy hue
 To tender thoughts of me alone be due!
 When eve leads on the dreary night for me
 I kiss the arms thou st left and think of thee
 Fret if the coverlet uneven go
 Or wakeful bird of dawn forget to crow
 On winter nights I ply for thee the loom
 Sew purple cloth, shall the sword be its doom?
 From maps I learn a painted world and tell
 Where each remote barbarian tribe doth dwell
 With joy I hear my hip-dog Crugis whine
 Only she shares the bed that once was thine
 No love like wedlock's love can e'er endure,
 'Tis Venus self that fans a flame so pure
 O keep thy bridal troth without a stain!
 Thus only thus I wish thee home again

(in 3 to Cranstoun)

O PAULLS! Vex my grave with tears no more,
 No prayers unlock the portals of the tomb,
 When once the dead have passed neath Hades' law,
 Barred stand the adamantine doors of doom
 My life changed not—to slander gave no cause,
 'Twixt wedding torch and death's torch did we dwell
 Renowned nature and birth gave me my laws
 No fear to greater virtue could compel
 My meed—a mother's tears the city's moan
 Even great Caesar's grief championed the dead,
 His daughter by her sister peer left lone,¹

Cornelia who speaks is half sister to Julia daughter of Augustus
 This princess had not yet achieved notoriety

We saw that by a god tears could be shed.
Be sons' sons pillars of our line ; the boat
May now put forth ; many shall swell my fame ;
A wife's last triumph, and of fairest note,
Is praise's incense offered to her name.
Paulus, our pledges I commend to thee ;
Burnt in my bones still breathes a mother's care ;
Discharge a mother's duty, then, for me ;
For now thy shoulders all the load must bear.
Kiss them, and kiss them for their mother ; dry
Their childish tears ; thine all the burden now.
And if thou grieve'st, let them not be nigh,
Or with a smile thy sorrow disavow.
Enough that thou the weary nights shouldst moan.
And woo my semblance back in visions vain ;
And whisper to my portrait when alone,
As if the lips could answer thee again.
If e'er these halls should own another queen,
And a new mother should usurp my bed,
My children, ne'er let frowning look be seen,
But honour her your father chose to wed.
So shall your manners win her tender grace,
And surely she will love for love return ;
Nor praise too much your mother to her face,
For fear her breast with jealous feelings burn.
But should my image still his thoughts engage,
And Paulus dower my dust with love so rare,
O learn to watch your father's failing age,
And shield his weary widowed heart from care !
Heaven add to yours the years I hoped in store,
And may your lives my aged Paulus cheer !
'Tis well : I ne'er the robes of mourning wore,
And all my children gathered round my bier.

(iv. II, tr. Cranstoun.)

PUBLIUS OVIDIUS NASO (43 B.C.-A.D. 18) is the most fertile of the elegiac poets. He used the metre for didactic purposes in the 'Calendar' (see pp. 123 ff.), 'Art of Love', 'Cures of Love', and 'Cosmetics'. He tells of love in his 'Amours' and 'Heroines', and he turns to lamentation in his 'Sorrows'. Much of his fame rests on his hexameter work, the Metamorphoses (see pp. 242 ff.) but the skill in story telling and description there displayed is found in his elegies too. Ovid wrote with uncanny facility, and this sometimes betrayed him into petty cleverness and conceits. Quintilian stiffly sentences him as 'too much in love with his own genius' and as 'praiseworthy in parts'. He has not the imaginative power of Propertius; his clear-cut pictures lack the mysterious glamour of Virgil; his flippancy contrasts strongly with the sincerity of his predecessors. Yet it is a relief to turn from morbid egotism to a liveliness that refuses to take itself or others too seriously. If Corinna (of the 'Amours') is a lay figure, she figures in many lifelike pictures. If diffuseness mars the tales of love, it plays round true insight and good psychology. Even the poems of exile are illumined by flashes of spirit. Ovid would have been better company than any other Roman poet except Horace.

Among his earlier works were the imaginary letters of 'Heroines'. Here is a scene that Penelope describes to Ulysses:

THE Greeks are home, their leaders free from toil,
 Our country gods receive the foreign spoil.
 Brides bring thank-offerings for their lord's return
 And smiling watch the altars brightly burn.
 Hanging entranced upon their husband's lips
 As he narrates proud Iliad's eclipse
 While elders stern and trembling girls enjoy
 To hear his story of the fall of Troy.
 Then dinner done he draws a battle plan
 And shows how this affray and that began
 Wetting his finger that some drops of wine
 May Troy and all her citadels design
 But what avails that Troy has been dethroned
 And that her walls are levelled to the ground
 If a war widow still I lonely stay

And my dear lord is ever far away! . . .

For me alone Troy's battlements remain;

All other women have their men again.

(Heroides, 1, tr. F. A. Wright.)

Very real pathos is shown in the letter of Canace, daughter of Aeolus, to her brother Macareus, who had 'loved too well'. But in the Odyssey the King of the Winds is said to have given his six daughters as wives to his six sons:

HIS little Grand-child he commands away,
In desert Place to Dogs and Birds a Prey.
The Babe cry'd out, as if he understood,
And begg'd his Pardon with what Voice he cou'd.
Out went the King; my Voice its Freedom found,
My Breasts I beat, my blubber'd Cheeks I wound.
And now appear'd the Messenger of Death,
Sad were his Looks, and scarce he drew his Breath,
To say, 'Your Father sends you'—(with that Word
His trembling Hands presented me a Sword:)
'Your Father sends you this; and lets you know
That your own Crimes the Use of it will show.'
Too well I know the Sense those Words impart:
His Present shall be treasur'd in my Heart.
For thee, poor Babe, what Crime could they pretend?
How could thy Infant Innocence offend?
A Guilt there was; but Oh that Guilt was mine!
Thou suffer'st for a Sin that was not thine.
Yet long thou shalt not from my Arms be lost,
For soon I will o'ertake thy Infant Ghost.
But thou, my Love, and now my Love's Despair,
Perform his Fun'rals with paternal Care.
His scatter'd Limbs with my dead Body burn,
And once more join us, in a little Urn.
If on my wounded Breast thou drop'st a Tear,
Think for whose sake my Breast that Wound did bear;

This for thy Sister too well lov'd fulfil,
Myself will I perform my Father's Will (Heroides ix, tr Dryden)

Ovid paints a charming picture of Leander's famous exploit of swimming the Hellespont to visit Hero (it should be noted that some of Saltonstall's rhymes are surpassed in quaintness only by the cuts wherewith his translation is adorned. Various alterations have seemed advisable not only here but also in some of the other translations)

BUT since both wind and seas deny to me
My passage think how I first came to thee
The Moon did yield a glimmering light to me
Which all the way did bear me company
I looking on her said Some favour have Towards me and think on the Latmin Cave¹
A mortals love made thee come from thy sphere
And she I love is like a goddess fair
For none unlesse that she a goddess be
Can be so vertuous and so fair as she
For as thy silver beams do shine more bright
Than lesser stars which yeild a dummer light
So is she fairest of fair womankind
Cynthia if thou dost doubt thy light is blind
No noise nor voice unto my ears did come
Only the water's murmur as I swom
Only the Halcyons for loved Ceyx sake²
Seem'd through the night some sweet complaint to make
But when I saw thy Torch O then quoth I,
Where that fire blazeth my fair love doth lye
For in that same shore said I doth she shine
Who is sole goddess fire and flume of mine
These words to my Arms did such strength restore
Methought the Sea grew calmer than before
Hot in my eager breast love did me keep

¹ A reference to Endymion

² Refers to a legend of the kingfishers

Lest I should feel the chill of the cold deep.
 But when I could by thee discernèd be
 Thou gav'st me courage by looking on me.
 Then to please thee, my Mistress, in thy sight
 I spread my arms abroad and swim with might.
 And though thy Nurse restrain'd thee, thou didst run
 Down to the shore, nor e'en the waves didst shun ;
 Embrace and kisses didst thou share with me :
 Kisses, ye gods, worth seeking o'er the sea.

(Heroides, 18, tr. Saltonstall, 1672.)

If we turn to Ovid's own experiences in love, we find delightful accounts of the arts of woman :

WHILE thou dost lead thy verse to Achilles wroth,
 And new sworne chiefs in maiden armes dost clothe,
 Wee, Macer, sit in Venus' slothful shade,
 And tender love hath great 'things hateful made.
 Often at length, my wench depart I bid,
 She in my lap sits still as earst she did.
 I said it shames me : halfe to weping framed,
 'Aye me,' she cries, 'to love why art ashamed ?'
 Then wreathes about my necke her winding armes,
 And thousand kisses gives, that worke my harmes :
 I yeeld, and back my wit from battells bring,
 Domesticke acts, and mine own warres to sing.
 Yet tragedies, and scepters fild my lines,
 But though I apt were for such high deseignes,
 My Mistris' deity did draw me fro it,
 And Love triumpheth o'er his buskind Poet.

(Amores, ii. 18, tr. Marlowe.)

This lively flirtation at the races seems founded on experience :

I SIT not here the noble horse to see,
 Yet whom thou favourest, pray may conquerour be.
 To sit and talke with thee I hither came,
 That thou maiest know with love thou mak'st me flame.

Thou viewst the course, I thee let either heed
What please them, and their eyes let either feede
In vaine why flyest backe? force conjoynes us now
The place's lawes thus benefit allow
But spare my wench thou at her right hand seated,
By thy side's touching ill she is entreated
And sit thou rounder, that behind us see
For shame presse not her backe with thy hard knee
But on the ground thy skirts too loosely lie
Gather them up, or lift them loe will I
Envious garments so good legges to hide,
To see the more—you envious wraps I chide
Ere these were seene I burnt what will these do
Flames into flame foulds thou pourest seas into
Yet in the meane time wilt small windes bestowe
That from thy fanne, mov'd by my hand may blow
Or is my heate of munde, not of the skie?
Is't woman's love my captive breast doth free?
While thus I speake, blacke dust her white robes ray
Foule dust, from her faire body go away
Now comes the pompe themselves let all men cheere
'Tis time to shout, the golden pompe comes heere
First Victory is brought with large spread wing
Goddesse come here make my love conquering
Souldiour applaud thy Mars no warres we move,
Peace pleaseth me and in mud peace is love
Thee gentle Venus and thy boy that flies
Child archer, praise we ayde my enterprize,
Let my new mustris graunt to be beloved
She beckt and prosperous signes gave as she moved
What Venus promis'd promise thou we pray
Greater than her, by her leave th' art, I le say
Thy legges hang down, thou maiest, if that be best,
A while thy tiptoes in the grating rest.
Now greatest spectacles the Praetor sends,

Then with huge steps came violent Tragedie,
 Sterne was her front, her cloake on ground did lie.
 And first she sayd : ' When will thy love be spent ?
 Thou clingest ever to one argument.
 Now give the Roman Tragedie a name,
 To fill my lawes thy wanton spirit frame.'
 The other smilde, (I wot) with sidelong eyes,
 Erre I ? or mirtle in her right hand lies.
 ' With heavy wordes,' she sayd, ' stout Tragedie
 Why treadst me downe ? must thou aye heavy be ?
 I, poet, of thy mind the seeds first knew,
 To me thou ow'st it that she doth thee sue.'

(Amores, iii. 1, tr. Marlowe.)

He is conscious of the immortality of the poet, and appreciative of his predecessors and friends :

ENVY, why twit'st thou me, my time's spent ill ?
 And call'st my verse, fruits of an idle quill ?
 Or that (unlike the line from whence I sprung)
 War's dusty honours I pursue not young ?
 Or that I study not the tedious laws ;
 And prostitute my voice in every cause ?
 Thy scope is mortal ; mine eternal fame :
 Which through the world shall ever chant my name.
 Homer will live, whil'st Tenedos stands, and Ide ;
 Or, to the sea, fleet Simois doth slide :
 And so shall Hesiod too, while vines do bear,
 Or crooked sickles crop the ripened ear.
 Callimachus, though in invention low,
 Shall still be sung : since he in art doth flow.
 No loss shall come to Sophocles proud vain.
 With sun, and moon, Aratus shall remain.
 Whil'st slaves be false, fathers hard, and bawds be whorish,
 Whil'st harlots flatter, shall Menander flourish.
 Ennius, though rude, and Accius high-reared strain,

A fresh applause in every age shall gain
 Of Varro's name what ear shall not be told?
 Of Jason's Argo? and the fleece of gold?
 Then shall Lucretius lofty numbers die
 When earth and seas in fire and flames shall fry
 Tityrus Tillage Aeneas shall be read
 Whilst Rome of all the conquer'd world is head
 Till Cupid's fires be out and his bow broken
 Thy verses (neat Tibullus) shall be spoken
 Our Gallus shall be known from east to west
 So shall Lycoris whom he now loves best
 The suffering plough share or the flint may wear
 But heavenly poesy no death can fear
 Kings shall give place to it and kingly shows
 The banks o'er which gold-bearing Tagus flows
 Kneel hinds to trash me let bright Phoebus swell
 With cups full flowing from the Muses well
 Frost fearing myrtle shall impale my head
 And of sad lovers I'll be often read
 Envy the living not the dead doth bite
 For after death all men receive their right
 Then when this body falls in funeral fire
 My name shall live and my best part aspre

(Atiores 1 15 to Ben Jonson The Poetaster 1 1)

He combines literary appreciation with the traditional lament of elegy in an exquisite dirge for Tibullus

IF Memnon¹ if Achilles drew when dead
 A Goddess-mother's tears sad Elegy!
 Thy undeserving tresses loosely spread
 For now indeed thy name shall suited be
 The poet of thy art—thy glory burns—
 Tibullus breathless body loads the pyre
 Love breaks his bow his quiver downward turns

Memnon son of Eos the Dawn was slain by Achilles son of Thetis.
 Paris aided by Apollo mortally wounded Achilles

And sees his torches dim their deaden'd fire ;
And droops his wings, and smites his bosom bare ;
Tears dew his ringlets ; sobs convulse his frame ;
So from thy roof he pass'd, Iulus¹ fair !
When Venus' other son his last road came.
Nor less was Venus by the bard's death moved,
Than when the wild boar rent her lover's² thigh ;
Yet bards are sacred deem'd, of heaven belov'd :
And some believe us fill'd with deity.
Officious death e'en sacred things profanes
O'er all alike his darkening hands are spread :
Maeonides,³ whose founts' perennial strains
Bathe every poet's lip, sang and is dead.
Him did Avernus in its gulf immerse ;
His strains alone elude the greedy pile :
The toil of Troy endures in glorious verse,
And web unravell'd by the nightly wile.
Thus Nemesis, and Delia thus, shall live :
Who first and last Tibullus captive led :
Ah ! nymphs ! what aid can past devotions give ?
Egyptian timbrels, and a lonely bed ?
When fall the good, I doubt, (my weakness spare)
That there are gods in heaven ; alike our doom ;
Live pure, though pure, ye die ; to shrines repair,
Death from the temple tears you to the tomb.
Or go : let faith be placed in moving strains ;
Behold Tibullus on his death-pile burn !
Scarce of that graceful form and mind remains
Enough to fill the hollow of an urn.
Love's queen, that on Sicilia's mountains reigns,
Turn'd her soft eyes away, and drop'd a tear :
Yet better this than if Phaeacia's plains⁴

¹ Iulus was son of Aeneas, who was, by Anchises, son of Venus the mother of Cupid.

² Adonis.

³ Homer.

⁴ Tibullus had been very ill in Corcyra.

Had heap'd their dust upon thy unknown bier,
 Here did a mother close thy fading eyes,
 And to thy ashes the last offerings bear;
 Hither a sister came, in mourning guise,
 And, unadorn'd, tore loose her streaming hair,
 With thy dear kindred Delia too was seen,
 The former object of thy tender fire,
 And Nemesis, who thy last love had been,
 Her kisses mingled, nor forsook thy pyre
 Delia departing murmur'd ' Bliss was thine
 And thine was life, when I thy flame was known
 But Nemesis, ' Why at my loss repine?
 The "dying, faltering grasp" ¹ was mine alone
 But if of mortal natures aught remain,
 Beyond an empty name, and sitting shade,
 Tibullus now has joined the blissful train,
 E'en now he wanders in Elysium's glade.
 Thou, skill'd Catullus! shalt the meeting give,
 Thy arm within thy Calvus' arm entwined.
 While ivy sprays, that ever verdant live,
 With flowering wreath thy youthful temples bind
 And Gallus, thou, if false th' accuser's tale
 Unstain'd with treason 'gainst thy prince and friend,
 Thou, prodigal of bleeding life! shalt hail
 Tibullus, as his steps to meet you wend
 With them thy shade shalt haunt, if shade there be,
 Accomplish'd poet! added to the blest
 Sleep safe in quiet urn. oh peace to thee!
 Light may the turf upon thy ashes rest!

(Amores, iii 9, tr Sir Charles Elton)

Ovid may bid us farewell in a letter sent from exile to Perilla, a poetess, whom some believe to have been his daughter.

¹ A reminiscence of Tibullus, i : 36 p 133

GO thou my letter, being writ so fast,
And to salute Perilla make thou haste.
What ere she does, when she knows thou art there,
She'll ask thee why thou'rt come, and how I fare ;
Tell her I live, but wish I did not so,
Since length of time can never heal my woe.
Returned to Muses that have been my curse
I make my words to fit alternate verse.
And ask, ' Dost thou to tasks we shared resort,
And sing songs, though not as thy father taught ?
First to the Muses' spring to lead was I,
Lest thy fair rill should perish and run dry.
But I do fear that since I am orethrown,
That now thy breast is dull and heavy grown :
For, while I might, thy lines and mine I'd read,
Me as thy Judge and Master thou didst heed ;
And to thy Verses I an ear would lend,
And make thee blush when thou didst make an end.
Yet now perhaps it may be thou dost shun
All books, because my ruin thence was won :
Fear not Perilla, so thy Poems prove
Nor man nor maid can learn from them to love :
Old age will lay its hand upon thy grace,
Old age which cometh on with noiseless pace.
They'll say, " This one was fair," a grief 'twill be,
And thou wilt plain thy glass doth lie to thee.
All things are subject to mortality
Except the mind and ingenuity.
For though my country, friends, and home I've left,
And all things took from me that could be reft :
Yet still my Muses do with me remain,
And Caesar cannot take away my vein.
Who though he should me of my life deprive,
Yet shall my fame when I am dead survive.

While martial Rome from her sev'n hills surveys
A world subdued, mankind shall read my lays '

(Tristia, iii. 7, tr. Saltonstall.)

Ovid died in exile, and with him died elegy, killed by his facile fertility. He had lost the simplicity of Tibullus; succeeding ages (though the attempt was rare) could not attain to his ease of style. Martial was a master of the metre, but his epigrams belong to a different class of literature. Yet 'the sweete wittie soule of Ovid lives in mellifluous and hony-tongued Shakespeare', his name lives as he prophesied, and with every renaissance he is reborn

D R A M A

THE history of Rome's dramatic achievement illustrates both her indebtedness to Greek literary guidance and the characteristic emergence of her own national qualities. Without Greek culture the native elements of drama at Rome could hardly have found literary expression. Roman gravitas gave the new birth a healthy constitution to resist the danger of dilettantism.

Germes of dramatic performance are first found in the rough country mummings which in Italy, as in Greece, celebrated the safe-gathering of harvest or vintage.¹ Closely connected with these were the 'Fescennine² verses', a sort of impromptu dialogue, cast in rough metrical form, in which the crude 'vinegar'³ of Italy sharpened broad repartee and rustic banter. Fescennine licence, tolerated in the country, came into early conflict with authority in the town,⁴ where, as Horace tells us, its point-blank personalities led to disorder and the breaking of heads.

SO laws were passed with penalties and pains
To guard the lieges from abusive strains,
And poets sang thenceforth in sweeter tones,
Compelled to please by terror in their bones.
(Ep. II. i. 152-5, tr. Conington.)

Humbled, but not suppressed, the Fescennines continued to find favour with the Roman youth. The note of personality was not

¹ Cf. Virgil, Georgics, II. 380 sqq., and Tibullus, II. i. 50-6.

² Supposed (on the analogy of the Atellane, see p. 167, n. 6) to be connected with Fescennium, a small town in Etruria. Another derivation, also ancient, connects the word with fascinum (=the evil eye), which it was desired to avert at a moment of apparent success. But there are philological objections to this latter view.

³ Horace (Sat. I. vii. 32) uses the phrase 'Italian vinegar' to describe the mordant wit of the country-side.

⁴ For the orthodox Roman view of personalities on the stage, cf. Cicero, de Republica, IV. x: 'Our life and character should be submitted to the sentence of judicial tribunals, and not to the whims and fancies of comic poets.'

entirely silenced. Personal ridicule¹ obscene enough, but good natured persisted in the 'Fescennine jests' at weddings and triumphs².

Native farce at Rome—if Livy can be trusted—arose from the union of the Fescennines with Etruscan pantomime. The evidence is a disputed chapter from Livy³ describing the first appearance in Rome of professional players. This innovation, it is somewhat surprising to find, was due primarily to the exigencies of religion. The ordinary stock observances failing to alleviate a severe pestilence in the City, recourse was had to novel expedients including 'scenic representations' which Livy describes as being dances to the music of the flute (though without words) performed by histriones, professional dancers imported from Etruria. This example, Livy states, incited the young nobles of Rome to combine burlesque imitations of the Etruscan dances with the dialogue and gesture of the old Fescennine.

These semi-dramatic productions improved on the formal side but still plotless⁴ became an established diversion performed in tune by professional actors. Livius Andronicus (c. 284-204 B.C. see p. 16) was the first to break away from their traditional inconsequence and to compose and produce at Rome the first plays with a coherent plot⁵. In consequence of this advance the young folk, finding that dramatic composition was becoming an 'art' too specialized for their powers, 'left the regular acting to the professionals and began to improvise comic verses'.⁶ These were subsequently known as exodia (after pieces)⁷. They ¹ A supposed prophylactic—at times of rejoicing—against the evil eye or jealousy of the gods. The use of the Fescennine on these occasions has been thought to point to its connexion with fascinum.

² References to this custom at weddings abound from Catullus (fl. 65 B.C.) to Claudian (fl. c. A.D. 390). For its use at triumphs of the coarse verses chanted by the soldiers of Julius Caesar (Suetonius Julius c. 49 § 4 and c. 51).

³ Under the year 364 B.C. (Livy vii c. 2). Livy's story lacks the support of other evidence. Some critics see in it the invention of a learned antiquarian anxious to square the development of Comedy at Rome with that of Comedy in Greece as traced by Aristotle in the Poetics. The theory has its difficulties (cf. D. Alton Horace and His Age pp. 255-67).

⁴ Livy loc. cit. has caused some confusion by using the term satura of these performances. Probably he uses it in the sense of jumble or medley (cf. lanx satūra = a dish full of various ingredients) and not as a term for a specific genre of drama called Satura. See p. 281 n. 1.

⁵ See p. 171.

⁶ Livy loc. cit.

⁷ i.e. short epilogues to larger pieces.

resembled, and were presently fused with, the 'Atellane Plays',¹ amateur farces which recall the modern harlequinade both in their informality and their stock characters. The latter were usually four in number—Maccus (The Clown), Pappus (The Old Dotard), Bucco (The Glutton), and Dossennus (The Cunning Old Hunchback). The Atellane was worked up into some sort of literary form by Novius and Pomponius² about 90 B.C. The few extant fragments of their work are insufficient even for an outline of these farces. We may guess at their general character from the titles which survive, e.g. Maccus Miles (Maccus 'joins up'), Maccus Agricola (Maccus turns Farmer), Pappus Praeteritus (Pappus Bottom of the Poll), Maccus Virgo (Maccus as Maid). Other titles suggest that the authors amused themselves and their audience by poking fun at the habits of provincials and even by burlesque³ of serious or tragic subjects.

The Atellane continued to flourish intermittently until about the end of the first century A.D., though its claim to favour as an 'occasional piece' was contested by the Mime. The Mime appears to have been introduced from Magna Graecia, originally as 'a ballet divertissement, without song or dialogue'.⁴ In its Italian form it developed into a short 'knock-about' farce, of a licentious order. A typical theme was the trickery employed by the artful lover to conceal from the doltish husband his misconduct with the faithless wife.⁵ While it bore a resemblance to the Atellane, it differed in several particulars. No masks (such as were necessary for the stock characters of the Atellane) were worn, and the actors performed without shoes.⁶ The absence of these encumbrances made for greater agility and a freedom of gesture and grimace which, with the sprightly musical accompaniment, gave warmth and gay vigour to ¹ From Atella in Campania, whence these 'Oscan farces' were supposed to have come. These were the only dramas in which a Roman citizen could take part without loss of status; cf. the story of Laberius, pp. 169-70.

² Cf. Merry, Fragments of Roman Poetry, pp. 187-95.

³ Here there was Greek precedent in the ἰλαροτραγῳδία (= 'mythological travesty in tragic form') of Rhinthon of Tarentum (c. 300 B.C.). The Amphitryon of Plautus (see p. 198) is perhaps an imitation of this kind of composition, known to the Romans as fabula Rhinthonica.

⁴ See Merry, p. 237.

⁵ Compare Ovid's description, Trist. ii. 497 ff., and cf. S. G. Owen, P. Ovidi Nasonis, Tristium Liber Secundus, Clarendon Press, 1924, pp. 264-6.

⁶ They were known as planipedes (= 'flat-feet'). Comic actors wore the soccus (= loose slipper).

the performance. Stock-characters were the husband the rival the wife and the pert lady's maid who wore a short mantle (*micinium*¹). The two latter parts were played by women². A further distinction was that the Mime was more a drama of the town the Atellane of the country.

In its literary form the Mime seems to have come into prominence in the time of Sulla (c. 90 B.C.) and to have received its most polished treatment at the hands of D. LABERIUS a Roman knight (c. 105-43 B.C.) and PUBLILIUS SYRUS (fl. c. 50 B.C.). Little remains of the latter's work except for a collection drawn from the Mimes of some 700 pithy saws. There is a sagacious rule of thumb morality about them to show that in Syrus's hands at any rate there was an undercurrent of something better in the Mime³. Two characteristic examples may be quoted⁴.

Fortune's like glass most brittle when most bright and

A remedy for all your wrongs—forget them!

(tr. Dimsdale⁵)

Over forty titles survive to prove that Laberius widened the range of subject and did not hesitate to trespass on the preserves both of Comedy and of the Atellane. His homely trenchancy⁶ may be sampled in the expression

I fell in love like a cock roach into a basin his humour in the picture of the thin shanked fuller⁷ treading cloth in the water

What's here?

A man think you or Balearic crane?

Hence the alternative title of the Mime—fabula miciniata.

¹ In this respect the Mime differs from all other Roman stage productions. It was the one form of drama in which women acted.

² Merry p. 250.

³ The Latin originals of these and the following quotations are to be found in Merry's Fragments of Roman Poetry unless another source is indicated.

⁴ Hist. of Lat. Lit. p. 77.

⁵ Aulus Gellus (c. A.D. 170) censures him for introducing a low and ignoble Latinity (Noctes Atticae xix. xiii. 3 cf. ib. xvi. vii. 1).

⁶ The follies were a favourite butt both of the Atellane-writers e.g. Novius and Pomponius (see Merry pp. 188 and 192) and of the comedians (see e.g. ib. p. 105).

reflective morality of which from time to time we gain glimpses. In Tragedy and Comedy proper the obligation to Greece is easier to recognize. There is more evidence to guide us and the debt is frankly acknowledged.

Livius Andronicus¹ has already been mentioned as the first writer to stage (in 240 B.C.) Latin plays² with a consecutive plot. The occasion of these pioneer performances was the peace-celebration after the First Punic War³. In the plays (which were rough adaptations from the Greek) Livius made the first crude attempt to follow the original metres and reproduce them in Latin⁴. In place of the chorus he established behind the scenes a professional singer, who chanted to a flute accompaniment lyrical interludes known as cantica, the actor on the stage meanwhile delivering the appropriate gestures. Livius may therefore claim to be the originator of a Graeco-Roman drama. From the meagre fragments, tragic and comic little can be gathered of its general character. The bulk of the work seems to have been a bald imitation of the Greek with here and there a happy line⁵. Perhaps our sense of loss is somewhat tempered by our knowledge that Cicero, for all his admiration of the earlier Latin poets, did not consider the plays of Livius worth a second reading⁶.

¹ See p. 167. He was a semi-Greek, probably captured and brought to Rome after the siege and capture of Tarentum (272 B.C.). His first name suggests that he acted as tutor in the household of a Livius whose children he is supposed to have taught. It was for their benefit probably that he translated the Odyssey (see p. 16) as well as specimens of Greek Tragedy and Comedy.

² It is convenient here to distinguish the various terms applied to Latin plays. The term fabula palliata (from pallium the Greek dress) is used to denote Latin Comedy with Greek scenery and Greek characters. Latin Comedy the scene of which is laid in Rome is known as fabula togata (from toga the national dress of Rome). Latin Tragedy dealing with a theme drawn from Roman history or legend, is known as fabula praetexta or praetextata (from toga praetexta the purple hemmed toga worn by Roman magistrates). Fabula crepidata (from crepida the high buskin or boot worn by tragic actors) denotes a Latin Tragedy with a Greek theme and setting.

³ Observe once more the close relation which existed at all times between the State religion and the stage. Four festivals in the Roman year (together with religious celebrations such as triumphs and funerals) were the occasions regularly appointed for dramatic performances.

⁴ For his Odyssey on the other hand he had used the native Saturnian metre (see p. 16).

⁵ Even Horace—by no means a sympathetic critic (cf. p. 168)—admits that there were occasional good lines (Ep. II. 1. 69-75).

⁶ Brutus 18.

the Metelli is familiar Naevius had hinted that it was not altogether merit which made the Metelli consuls

Fate makes Metelli magistrates of Rome ¹

The Metelli retorted with a Saturnian verse

The consuls will make trouble for Naevius the poet ²

The upshot was that Naevius found himself in prison ³ Even this did not crush his spirit though his fate served as a warning to successors and probably accounts for the fact that Roman Comedy did not again attempt political personalities in the manner of the Old Attic Comedy ⁴ It was in Comedy ⁵ that Naevius was most at home and it is in his comic fragments that we find some of his most defiant utterances

I'll loose lots o' liberal language at the Liberalia! ⁶

and the following a protest to the people against his treatment by the nobles

WHAT in the theatre wins me folks' applause
Shall any great man dare to interfere with?
Good God! twere better here (sc. on the stage) to be a slave

Than to live free as liberty's now reckon'd!

As a piece of observant description lightly handled his picture of the flirt at the games (in the Girl from Tarentum) could hardly be bettered.

¹ An iambic line. Note the double entendre in the word Fate which may mean mere chance or misfortune in this context our misfortune

² There is a somewhat similar ambiguity in the reply. The word malum with which Naevius is threatened means 'trouble' but suggests the whipping—the punishment of slaves.

³ Plautus alludes to this see p. 196

⁴ A field in which Italian vinegar would surely have excelled itself! As it was Saturn took over the place intended by nature for a Roman Comedy of Invective Cf. p. 281

⁵ Sedigitus places him third in his canon (p. 356). The epithet which he bestows—burning Naevius—is a fair description of the poet's fiery character

⁶ Not on the extreme alliteration Libera lingua loquemur ludis Liber alius!

LIKE a shuttle-cock she flutters, backwards, forwards, here and there,
Nodding, winking and caressing, making lovers everywhere.

She's at home with all the youngsters, flirts with all, flies to and fro.

Sits by one and fires his passion, squeezing hand and tangling toe :
Shows her ring to one to gaze at, blows a kiss to one above :
Sings with one, with one exchanges cabalistic signs of love.

In the end Naevius's enemies proved too strong for him. The old poet died an exile at Utica in or about 199 B.C. An epitaph, thought to be his own work and written in Saturnians, proudly claims that after his death 'men at Rome forgot to speak the Latin tongue'.¹ Certainly among Roman poets, as his Epic proves, he has a conspicuous claim to be remembered as a pioneer and a patriot. In Comedy his immediate successor is Plautus (though in view of the outspoken character of Naevian Comedy it would be truer perhaps to say Lucilius,² the satirist), in Tragedy—as in Epic—Q. ENNIUS (239–169 B.C.).³

Ennius is known to have attempted Comedy though apparently without much success.⁴ His temperament found a more congenial outlet in his adaptations from Greek Tragedy,⁵ mostly from the drama of Euripides. The fragments of one play—a version of Euripides's Medea—show by comparison with the original Greek that in one play, at least, he followed his model very closely. The main difference is that between the two languages. The Greek is compressed and flexible, the Latin dignified but prolix. But careful examination of his tragic remains as a whole establishes an original and personal factor. Ennius himself claimed to have three 'hearts',⁶ the Oscan (from his South Italian birthplace), the Greek (from his education), and the Roman (from his adopted city). These sources are

¹ Merry, p. 223.

² See pp. 281 ff.

³ See pp. 18 ff., 130, 282.

⁴ He appears tenth—and last—in Sedigitus's list (p. 356).

⁵ He is credited with only one praetexta—a drama on The Rape of the Sabine Women.

⁶ To a Roman the breast is the seat of the intelligence. A 'hearty man' (cordatus homo) is not therefore an unintelligent one.

mingled in his work. The Greek gives it refinement, form, and polish (as shown in his improvement of metre and dialogue), the Roman imparts a moral and sententious colouring. To the Italian¹ perhaps are due the moments of strong and convincing emotion which sometimes flash out in Ennius. Take, for instance, the lyrical passage in which Alcmaeon, having murdered his mother, appeals to Arsinoë for help against the Avenging Deities,

THEY come, they come—the Furies wreak ?
 On me their vengeance, me they seek
 Foul fiends ! (To Arsinoë) Ah ! lend thine aid !
 With flame-borne pow'r they torture me
 Dark forms and snake-girt locks I see,
 And blazing brands—oh agony !
 Save, save me dearest maid !

Or the lament of the captive Andromache over the fall of Troy,

WHERE turn for help ? Whence seek support ?
 In foreign fastness refuge find ?
 What comfort claim, with woe distraught
 From home, from palace banish'd,
 My father's altars undermin'd
 His house in ruins vanish'd ?
 Charr'd beam and sooted pile recall
 The furious flame that foul'd yon temple wall

O father ! O my fatherland !
 O royal house of Priam King of Troy !
 On every hand
 The foreign host saw I
 Thy fenced keep draw nigh

¹ Cicero (De Div. i. 31) praises Ennius for 'moral earnestness', certainly a Roman quality and for his exquisite sensibility and passion—these probably Italian characteristics to which the phrase of Scipio his patron—verses wrought in flame—very likely refers.

² In this and the following passage notice the alliteration, difficult at times to represent in translation but always a marked and effective feature of Roman poetry.

Thy gates on grating hinges roll'd,
 Thy halls of ivory and gold,
 Thy fretted roofs rich-wrought of old,
 Thy palace to destroy ;
 I saw all perish in one blazing pile.
 Of life perforce unliv'd,¹ the King
 Sank to the ground and perishing
 Jove's altar did defile.

Take again—for another effect—the opening scene of his Iphigenia where Agamemnon asks the sentry 'What of the night?'

AG. On heaven's high resonant shield o' nights upborne,
 Watchman, is aught to see?

SENTRY. The Wain is up,
 Driving the stars again and ever again
 Night's dizzy path along.

(tr. Dimsdale.)

These lines, blending the Greek and Roman genius, achieve sublimity. In weaker hands they might have been bombast.

The literary quality of Ennius's tragedy is unchallengeable. Its dramatic power, as also that of his successors, Pacuvius and Accius, we are less able to judge. MARCUS PACUVIUS (c. 220-132 B. C.),² the nephew and literary heir of Ennius, endeavoured still further to enrich the diction of tragedy, in particular by the introduction of high-sounding compound words. His reputation has suffered by the preservation of some of the more violent compounds which he attempted to acclimatize.³ Such eccentricities occur in his description of dolphins as

The flock
 Of Nereus, snout-uplifted, neck-inarch'd

(tr. H. E. Butler),

¹ A kind of play on words—a characteristic device in Ennius often crudely employed.

² See p. 281.

³ Yet compounds were natural to the genius of the language (e.g. Suovetaurilia), were used effectively by the early lyric poet, Laevius (c. 90 B.C.), and by Catullus in his Atis, and persisted in the spoken tongue. Augustan purism banished them from the higher forms of literature (see p. 369).

or of the tortoise (an extreme instance of enigmatical ingenuity 1)
as

FOUR FOOTED slow proceeding country bred
Short headed snake-neck d scabrous low unflesh d—
An animal inanimate yet voic d.¹

Yet he could write simply and effectively in a descriptive passage
Witness the following account ² of the start for Troy and the storm which burst upon the Greeks

HAPPY when their fleet left harbour they could watch the fish at play
They were never weary watching though they watched the livelong day

Meanwhile when it turned to sundown rough and rougher grew the main

Darkness doubled blinding blackness came with night and clouds of rain

Flame flashed out across the welkin thunder made the heavens rock

Hail with plenteous sleet commingled sudden fell with headlong shock

Everywhere the gales broke prison cruel whirling winds arose

And the ocean boiled in fury

(tr Wight Duff)

and the lines immediately following

The clash o' fleets

Creaking gear and clamorous sailors thunder roll and whistling sheets.

¹ This refers to the legend of the infant Hermes who is said to have slain a tortoise and used its shell to construct the first lyre

² Alliteration once more is prominent in the original.

He, too, can strike either the didactic chord, dear to Roman hearts,

COMPLAINT of fortune best beseems the man,
But lamentation were a woman's part;

or the equally popular political note,

Saved I these men that they might murder me?

a line which was quoted with effect against the conspirators at the funeral of Julius Caesar.

Pacuvius, however, seems on the whole to have laboured under a pompousness, which made him the butt of Lucilius and of later writers such as Persius.¹ LUCIUS ACCIUS (170-86 B. C.)² was more successful in joining lofty³ expression to the dignity of moral reflection and counsel, as in the hope of Ajax for his son:

In worth match thou thy sire, outmatch his luck⁴

(tr. Wight Duff),

or in the aphorism,

True men bear their misfortunes easily.

There are suggestions of imaginative power in the passage describing the impression made on the minds of herdsmen (who had never before seen a ship) by the coming of the Argo,

FROM the deep,
Loud-echoing with strange, inhuman roar,
So vast a bulk approaches; waves are roll'd
Before it, whirlpools eddy in its wake,
As forth it plunges, scattering the sea
And breathing back the spray-drops.

Next a Virgilian touch, previously unexampled, in lines charged

¹ Cf. pp. 376-7. The 'Antiquated Author' there mentioned is Pacuvius.

² See p. 355.

³ Horace (Ep. ii. i. 56) speaks of his 'grandeur', Ovid (Amores, i. xv. 19) of his 'spirited tongue'.

⁴ A passage interesting as the model of a famous Virgilian imitation (Aen. xii. 435-6).

with strong feeling for country life and understanding of its beauty and its hold

BY chance ere dawn hot sunshine's harbinger
When rustics drive the horned line afield
To cleave with steel the dewy steaming earth
And from the yielding furrow lift the sods

(tr Dimsdale)

and passion forcibly represented

TEREUS with untamed mood and ruthless heart
Looked on her frenzied with his flaming lust—
A desperate man then of his madness shapes
A deed most foul

(Ribbeck Trag Rom Frag 1871 p 218 tr Wight Duff)

A translation (from the opening lines of Euripides's Phoenissae) shows a growing tension of style by contrast with the diffuseness of Ennius

SUN who fierce heat and flashing flame unfoldst
From thy candescent car and hurrying steeds
Why inauspicious and ill favouring
Sheddest thou thy light upon the Theban race?

Lastly we may notice an expression of contempt for current superstition¹

TRUST not augurs who fill others ears
That their own houses they may fill with gold

(Ribbeck op cit p 157)

After Accius Roman Tragedy wanes. The old plays continued to be performed even in Imperial times and the skill of actors like Roscius or Aesopus still drew popular applause especially if the lines seemed capable of application to current politics. But during the last years of the Republic no new tragedian of real consequence appears.² The Augustan age seems to have witnessed something of a revival. Augustus himself not only

Against which both Ennius and Pacuvius had already protested

¹ The original passage plays on the sound of aurum (gold) and auris (an ear)

² Most of the new work seems to have been in the nature of a literary composed an Ajax,¹ but bestowed handsome patronage upon at least one tragic writer.² Unhappily little is left to us beyond some names of authors and a few play-titles. Nothing remains from the tragedies of Asinius Pollius³ (76 B.C.—A.D. 4), and we are therefore unable to determine the value of the eulogies which Horace and Virgil saw fit to confer upon their patron.⁴ From Tacitus⁵ we learn that the two most popular plays of the period were the Thyestes of Varius Rufus, the friend of Horace and Virgil, and the Medea of Ovid, both of which won the warm praise of Quintilian.⁶ For the student of literary history the loss of the Medea is the more serious. It is at least doubtful whether the play was ever intended for stage-production.⁷ And it is tolerably certain that its general style and treatment owed much to the training of the rhetorical schools.⁸ With it we have lost an early example of the influence which the combined forces exercise written without any idea of production. A typical example is that of Cicero's brother, Quintus, who wrote off four 'tragedies' within sixteen days.

¹ He was not satisfied with its style and destroyed it, remarking to his friends that 'Ajax had fallen on his sponge', i.e. not, as in the play, on his sword. (Suetonius, Aug. c. 85.)

² He presented Varius Rufus with 1,000,000 sesterces (=£10,000) for his tragedy, Thyestes, which was performed in 29 B.C. at the games given to celebrate the victory of Actium.

³ For Pollio, see also p. 375, note 1.

⁴ Cf. Horace, Odes, II. i. 10, and Virgil, Eclagues, viii. 10. Virgil hails him as the Roman Sophocles and Horace uses terms only less complimentary. Tacitus, however, tells us that he modelled himself on Accius and Pacuvius and implies that his compositions were 'stiff and dry'. (Dialogus, c. 21.)

⁵ Tacitus, Dialogus, c. 12.

⁶ Inst. Or. x. i. 98. He is even prepared to back the Thyestes against any of the classical Greek plays. This is high praise, even when allowance has been made for the unsoundness of Quintilian in matters of dramatic criticism.

⁷ The plays of Pollio and Varius, of which performances were given, seem to have been written some years before the Medea.

⁸ For Ovid's rhetorical training, cf. p. 246. Ovid's methods may be paralleled from another of his works. The Heroides (see pp. 153 ff.) are semi-dramatic monologues in which his taste for romantic psychology is freely indulged. But in form they are little more than versified 'deliberative' essays as practised in the rhetorical schools. From one of the two fragments of the Medea

I had the power to save, and ask you then
If I have power to ruin

(tr. H. E. Butler).

we may infer that Ovid treated the theme on rhetorical lines. The epigrammatic turn of the sentence is quite in the Senecan manner.

of Recitation and Declamation¹ brought to bear upon literature as well as a valuable means of bridging the gap which separates the plays of the Republic from those of the Neronian age

In the ten plays which have come down to us under the name of Seneca we possess our only complete specimens of Roman Tragedy Nine² of them deal with the well-worn themes of Greek legend, and these are generally assigned—on the internal evidence of sentiment and style—to LUCIUS ANNAEUS SENECA, the philosopher³ (c. 4 B.C.—A.D. 65)⁴ For subject matter, Seneca, in common with the earlier Roman dramatists borrowed from one or more of the three great Athenian masters from Euripides especially But while Ennius, Pacuvius, and Accius had been content merely to translate or to adapt, Seneca went a good deal further His method was to rewrite the plays according to the gospel preached in the declamation schools of his own day The result is a drama frankly rhetorical In it the vices of rhetoric—its tiresome cleverness, its want of proportion, its diffuseness—are all paraded in their least attractive form The cleverness is particularly noticeable in the dialogue Senecan characters, regardless of sex, age, or standing, all conduct their conversation in the language of the declamation hall Quip calls to quip and epigram to epigram Nothing is more typical of the Senecan manner than the rapid fusillades as two parties exchange a fire of glittering repartee The duologue between Medea and her Nurse is but one example of this verbal musketry.

NURSE MEDEA

NURSE Foster-child
 Restrain thy fury, hardly art thou safe
 Though silent

MEDEA Fortune tramples on the meek,
 But fears the brave

¹ See the section on Literary Criticism pp. 375-6

² The tenth, the Octavia is usually supposed not to be the work of Seneca Its subject is the divorce and banishment of Nero's wife Octavia and it possesses interest as the only surviving example of a fabula praetexta or Roman historical drama But neither its literary nor its dramatic qualities are convincing

³ The epigrammatic style of the plays and the constant intrusion of Stoic doctrine agree closely with the manner and spirit of the Moral Epistles (see pp. 336 ff. 480 ff.)

⁴ See pp. 299 ff. 336 ff., 476 ff. 487

- N. When courage is in place
It wins approval.
- M. It can never be
That, courage should be out of place.
- N. To thee,
In thy misfortune, hope points out no way.
- M. The man who cannot hope should naught despair.
- N. Colchis is far away, thy husband lost ;
Of all thy riches nothing now remains.
- M. Medea now remains ! Land, sea, sword, fire,
God and the thunderbolt, are found in me.
- N. The King is to be feared.
- M. I claim a king
For father.
- N. Hast thou then no fear of arms ?
- M. I, who saw warriors spring from earth ?¹
- N. Thou'lt die !
- M. I wish it.
- N. Flee !
- M. Nay, I repent of flight.
- N. Thou art a mother.
- M. And thou seest by whom.
- N. Wilt thou not fly ?
- M. I fly, but first revenge.
- N. Vengeance may follow thee.
- M. I may, perchance,
Find means to hinder it.

(Medea, 157-73, tr. Harris.)

The wrangle between Pyrrhus and Agamemnon, in the Trojan Women, lends itself to a similar display :

¹ When Jason had sown the dragon's teeth, Medea helped him to destroy the armed host which sprang from them.

PYRRHUS AGAMEMNON

- PYRRHUS To grant kings life is kingly
 AGAMEMNON Why didst thou
 With thy right hand cut short a royal life?¹
 P Mercy gives often death instead of life
 A Mercy now seeks a virgin for the tomb?²
 P Thou deemst it crime to sacrifice a maid?³
 A More than their children kings should love their land
 P No law spares captives or denies revenge
 A What law forbids not honour's self forbids
 P To victors is permitted what they will
 A He least should wish to whom is granted most (Trojan Women 327-36 tr Harris)

Declamation is naturally prominent in the longer speeches but they are more often tedious than effective. One reason is that Seneca in true scholastic fashion can resist no opportunity of airing his learning mythological or otherwise. When Amphitryon⁴ appeals on behalf of his step-son Hercules to Jupiter we must needs hear the full tale of the Twelve Labours. Medea⁵ about to poison Jason's Corinthian bride collects all the known poisons of the globe and the Nurse supplies us with a neatly discriminated geographical list of each. But Seneca can commit even graver improprieties. Medea butchers her two sons openly and only wishes there were more of them.

Would that the children that made proud the heart
 Of Niobe were none that I had borne
 Twice seven sons! In bearing only two
 I have been cursed!

(Medea 954-6 tr Harris)

Pyrrhus son of Achilles had murdered Priam after the fall of Troy.
¹ The ghost of Achilles had demanded the sacrifice of the Trojan princess Polyxena before the Greeks could sail from Troy.
² Agamemnon had sacrificed his daughter Iphigenia in order to secure a passage to Troy for the Greek fleet, weather bound at Aulis.
Hercules Furens 204-75
³ Medea 705-38

Manto,¹ the prophetess, examines the entrails in public and gives a minute description of each gruesome detail. Worst of all, perhaps, is Theseus, piecing together the mangled remains of his son Hippolytus :

What is this I see,
Lacking in beauty, base, with many wounds ?
What part of thee it may be I know not,
Yet part of thee it is. Here, here repose,
Not in thine own but in a vacant place.

(Phaedra, 1265-8, tr. Harris.)

Such scenes of horror² could hardly have been presented on the stage. Perhaps it was never the author's intention that they should. He may have regarded his plays, like his Moral Epistles,³ as handy vehicles for his own ethical teaching. This supposition would account for the frequent irrelevance of the choruses, in which Stoic moralizing constantly prevails. A few typical lines may be quoted :

CHORUS. The sport of fate are we, yield then to fate.
Unquiet cares ne'er changed that distaff's thread.
Whatever we, the race of men, endure,
Whatever we may do, comes from above ;
Lachesis, with a hand that turns not back
Her distaff, spinneth out the thread of life ;
All walk a path prepared, and man's first day
Foretells his last ; not Jupiter himself
May make the spindle of the fates turn back ;
The order of her turning, fixed for all,
No prayers can change.

(Oedipus, 980-92, tr. Harris.)

Here we have one of the cardinal doctrines of Stoicism—the theory of an unalterable Fate. But it is a Stoicism too hard and too inhuman for ordinary acceptance. And it is precisely in its lack of humanity that Senecan drama fails to appeal. As in the schools of rhetoric, its characters are types, not individuals 'There is not a real human character in all the tragedies'¹

¹ Oedipus, 353-83

² This morbid passion for the unnatural may be paralleled from the routine of the declamation-schools (cf. Tacitus, Dialogus, c. 35, quoted on p. 386, and Petronius, Satyricon, § 1, quoted on p. 377).

³ See pp. 480 ff.

If Seneca's plays were not really written for stage production, it would be idle to make too much of their dramatic short comings. And in Seneca's favour it should be said that there are some scenes of indisputable power. But the real significance of his work lies not so much in its own merits and defects as in its influence upon the early course of Medieval drama.² Seneca's plays came to light at an early stage of the Renaissance and long enjoyed general esteem as the authentic type of Classical Tragedy. In Italy, the first tragedy written in the vernacular is actually introduced by the ghost of Seneca.³ In France, where 'classical' drama was most at home, a whole series of dramas 'after Seneca' was written, from the Cléopâtre of Jodelle (1552) onwards. Later, Corneille and even Racine were in his debt. The early English tragedy Gorboduc (1561) is a professed imitation of the Senecan manner. Kyd's Spanish Tragedie (c. 1584) borrows from almost all the plays. Sidney admired his style, Jonson translates passages from him for his own Catiline and Sejanus, Shakespeare may have known him in the complete translation published in 1581.⁴ A debt indirectly due to Seneca may be noted in Hamlet. The Ghost is lineally descended from the Ghost of Tantalus in the Thyestes.⁵

Modern judges with a fuller knowledge of Greek tragedy and a better critical equipment are not inclined to set the same store by Seneca's plays as did the Middle Ages. Nor can it be doubted what Horace, Rome's premier dramatic critic, would have made of work so directly in conflict with his canons and his hopes. Horace had looked forward to a national drama,⁶ a product more polished and more refined than the work of the Republican poets,⁷ broader in conception and appeal, and above all original

¹ A. D. Godley Senecan Tragedy, p. 241 in English Literature and the Classics (Clarendon Press 1912) a brilliantly amusing sketch well worth study.

² For a fuller account see Professor J. W. Cunliffe Introduction to Early English Classical Tragedy (Clarendon Press 1912).

³ Cammelli's Filosofo e Poeta 1499. Cf. Cunliffe op. cit. pp. xxiv ff.

⁴ Seneca His Ten Tragedies Translated into English.

⁵ Cf. Professor C. E. Vaughan Types of Tragic Drama Macmillan 1908 pp. 93 ff.

⁶ Horace is nothing if not practical and it is tolerably clear that his Art Poetica aims at shaping the course of the Augustan revival of Tragedy.

⁷ Cf. his strictures upon Ennius, Accius and others. His insistence in the sense that his own or Virgil's work was original. But even the Augustan revival failed to produce a tragic writer capable of holding the public interest. The Roman counterpart of Greek Tragedy was an ideal perhaps unattainable. Greek drama had flourished because of the freshness of its subject and the interpretation which it offered of the national life and religion. At Rome, themes from the Greek could not please as a novelty for ever, and the choice of a Roman motive was limited and difficult.¹ In such a soil Roman Tragedy could not be expected to develop a healthy, independent growth.

It has already been suggested that other comic poets could not afford to be so outspoken as Naevius.² Direct political allusion practically disappears in his younger contemporary, T. MACCIUS PLAUTUS (c. 254-184 B. C.), who came originally from Umbria.³ All his comedies⁴ are palliatae, professedly modelled on the Greek 'New Comedy',⁵ and containing lively pictures of low life and intrigue. Plot and scene are Greek, the humour and sentiment almost entirely Roman. Jests at Roman institutions and Roman foibles are scattered about with as little care for consistency as Shakespeare had in a later age, or less. Delicate characterization becomes the broadest caricature, sensitive wit a boisterous humour too varied and too exuberant to be adequately conveyed in a few excerpts. But, even in excerpts and in translation, as in the passages which follow, it is best to make Plautus his own critic.⁶

notably in the Ars Poetica, on elementary dramatic principles implies that in his opinion Roman drama was still a mine unworked and capable of extensive exploitation.

¹ See Introduction (p. 8). Of the eighty or so play-titles of Ennius, Pacuvius, and Accius only four or five are praetextae. 'The reason probably is that there was too much party-life in Rome to make the dramatic treatment of the national history equally acceptable to all' (W. Peterson, Quintilian, Book X, p. 95).

² See p. 173.

³ He was an actor in early life, lost his savings in imprudent speculation, and after a turn of manual labour took to writing plays for a living.

⁴ Twenty survive, probably Varro's selection (p. 357, and note).

⁵ The later Greek 'Comedy of Manners' (c. 340-260 B. C.), dramas of everyday life of which fidelity to nature and minute character-study are the leading features. The plot often depends on a happy recognition-scene in which the supposed slave-girl turns out to be an Attic citizen and is therefore able to marry her lover.

⁶ Notice particularly his numerous assonances, alliterative effects, and puns.

In the first, two slaves are discussing the character of Euchio, the famous miser in the Aulularia or Pot of Gold.¹

STROBILUS ANTHRAX.

STR A Pumice stone is not half so dry as that old Huncks
AN Say ye so, introth?

STR Take this from me If the least smoke shou'd chance to fly out of his House he strait allarms the Town, exclaims against Heaven and Earth, that he s undone, and ruined for ever!—I ll tell ye whene're he goes to Bed he tyes a Bladder at his Nose

AN What for?

STR For fear of losing part of his Breath when he 's asleep!

AN [somewhat incredulous] And doesn't he plug up his Windpipe too, lest any shou'd steal out that way?

STR 'Tis civil to believe me, since I do you

AN Why, truly, I do believe ye

STR Did you never hear, how it goes to the Soul of him to pour out the Water he has once wash'd his hands in?

AN Do'st think, Boy, we shall be able to squeeze out a swinging sum of Money of this old Gripes, to purchase our Freedom with?

STR Troth, shou'd ye beg the loan of Hunger itself of him, the Wretch wou'd deny ye Nay more, whenever he gets his Nails to be cut he carefully scrapes up all his Parings, and saves 'em

AN Why, faith this is the most miserable Cur upon the face of the Earth—But is he really such a pinching Wretch as you say?

STR Why t'other day a Kite chanced to steal a scrap of supper from him, this poor Devil goes strait to my Lord Chief Justice s, crying, roaring and howling for his Warrant to apprehend it—O, I cou'd tell ye a thousand of these Stories, if I had leisure

(Aulularia, Act II, Sc. 4 tr Anon 1694)

¹ The seventeenth-century English translation quoted has some flavour of the old fashioned Latin

O I'm wretchedly perplexed that I'm forced to go out a doors now, and troth, it goes sore against my mind, however, 'tis upon sure grounds For now's the time for our Officer to distribute the Money to the Poor Now if I should be negligent, and not be among the Beggars I'm afraid the World wou'd presently conclude, that I had got Gold at home For 'tis n't likely such a poor Fellow as I pretend to be, shou'd so little value Money, as not to be there Notwithstanding my restless care of concealing this Gold, it strangely runs in my Head, that all the World knows of it, and everybody seems to be more obliging and to complement me more than ever. They meet me stay me, embrace me enquire after my Health my Welfare, and every thing—Well I'll go, and be back again as soon as possibly

{Exit to market place}

{Aulularia Act I, Sc. 2 tr Anon 1694.}

Here is a slave-dealer in trouble with a rascally cook,¹ a stock character

BALLO CIEI

BA He calls it wrong who calls it mart for cooks,
A Thieves kitchen, for hire not cooks but crooks!

CH If what they say is your opinion,
What made you hire me?

BA Dearth there was but one!
But why did you sit there if you're a cook,
Alone of all the lot?

CH I'll tell you Look!
Directly men would hire a chef, 'tis clearest
They never want the man who's best and dearest,
The very cheapest rather they engage,
That is the reason why I held the stage.
Those beasts were shillings, but as for me
No man can make me budge for less than three

¹ Whom in accordance with custom he has hired for a special occasion from the Cooks Market

I'm not like many a cook, when food I flavour,
 Who piles the plates with mustard-fields for savour,
 Banquets—the beef!¹ his craving never curbs
 But seasons herbs with herbs and herbs with herbs!
 Shreds garlic, fennel, leeks and corianders,
 Beet, sorrel, broccoli and broad-beans squanders,
 Dilutes with silphium a pound in weight,
 Grates onions vile that th' eyes of those who grate
 Turn ere they've grated tear-distilleries.

When such men cook or sauce their cookeries
 They season not with any seasoning,
 But rather with blood-suckers blood-sucking!
 Of living guests the intestines to devour;
 That's why man's life is only for an hour!

- BA. And you? The sauce you use is godlike then;
 By which the life of man you can prolong?
 What makes you say their seasoning is wrong?
- CH. Two hundred years their life (no need to quibble!)
 Who nutriment that I have seasoned nibble.
 For when I've shredded in some pickleoni,²
 Some sauci-fly mosquito whacceroni,
 All of themselves at once they're piping hot!
 For Sea-sons³ you must season thus the pot.
 Land-sharks with castor-oil I castigate
 Or paregoric-oil in sublimate.

- BA. The Devil take you and your sauceries,
 And all your damnable mendacities!
 Was it for this to-day your fee you took?

- CH. Of course I own I am a costly Cook;
 But in return I make my pains appear
 Wherever I am hired . . .

- BA. To commandeer!

¹ Banquets—the beef! i.e. turns the guests into cattle by setting before them 'whole meadows' of rough vegetables.

² The chef's condiments are of course comic formations.

³ Sea-sons, i.e. fish, 'Neptune's cattle'.

- CII. D'you think to find a Cook with scales and balance
Who has not, sharp as hawk or eagle, talents ?
- BA. D'you think to go and cook at any house
Unless you sheathe your talons and cook . . . grouse ?
- CII. Put a good face upon it
- BA. Prithce, how
Have you at home and a good face, man, say ?
- CII. Because my broth will do for you to-day
As did Medea when she did Pelias down¹
Whose medicines and potions the old clown
Made, so 'tis said, a regular broth of a boy,
And so I'll do for you
Maybe you don't believe me ?
- BA. Too much talk !
Don't worry, that's my house ; now in you walk.
(Pseudolus, Act III, Sc. 2, tr. H. L. Rogers.)

The needy Parasite who sponges on the wealthy and tries to earn dinner-invitations by his wit or flattery is a favourite type with Plautus. Here is one who finding business bad resolves in desperation to hold an auction of his effects.

GELASIMUS

- GEL. Ah ! times are changed : that phrase we used to meet
Is out of favour now and obsolete —
'Come dine with me please do now, no excuse !
You know I want you sure you won't refuse ?'
To-day they've found a substitute expression
That plays the very deuce with our profession
I'd simply love to dine you, if I might

¹ Medea by magic, reversed Jason's father, Aeson, to youth. From missing to do the same for Pelias, Jason's enemy, she induced his daughters to begin the treatment by cutting him to pieces whereat she neglected the case. The Cook plays on Halio's ignorance, leaving him to draw his own conclusions as to what kind of 'broth of a boy' he will make of him.

(Rogers and Harkey, note ad loc.)

I'm not like many a cook, when food I flavour,
 Who piles the plates with mustard-fields for savour,
 Banquets—the beef! ¹ his craving never curbs
 But seasons herbs with herbs and herbs with herbs!
 Shreds garlic, fennel, leeks and corianders,
 Beet, sorrel, broccoli and broad-beans squanders,
 Dilutes with silphium a pound in weight,
 Grates onions vile that th' eyes of those who grate
 Turn ere they've grated tear-distilleries.
 When such men cook or sauce their cookeries
 They season not with any seasoning,
 But rather with blood-suckers blood-sucking!
 Of living guests the intestines to devour;
 That 's why man's life is only for an hour!

BA. And you? The sauce you use is godlike then;
 By which the life of man you can prolong?
 What makes you say their seasoning is wrong?

CH. Two hundred years their life (no need to quibble!)
 Who nutriment that I have seasoned nibble.
 For when I've shredded in some pickleoni,²
 Some sauci-fly mosquito whacceroni,
 All of themselves at once they're piping hot!
 For Sea-sons³ you must season thus the pot.
 Land-sharks with castor-oil I castigate
 Or paregoric-oil in sublimate.

BA. The Devil take you and your saucerics,
 And all your damnable mendacities!
 Was it for this to-day your fee you took?

CH. Of course I own I am a costly Cook;
 But in return I make my pains appear
 Wherever I am hired . . .

BA. To commandeer!

¹ Banquets—the beef! i. e. turns the guests into cattle by setting before them 'whole meadows' of rough vegetables.

² The chef's condiments are of course comic formations.

³ Sea-sons, i. e. fish, 'Neptune's cattle'.

- CU D you think to find a Cook with scales and balance
Who has not, sharp as hawk or eagle talents ?
- BA D you think to go and cook at any house
Unless you sheathe your talons and cook grouse ?
- CU Put a good face upon it
- BA Prithce how
Have you at home and a good face man say ?
- CU Because my broth will do for you to-day
As did Medea when she did Pelias down,¹
Whose medicines and potions the old clown
Made so 'tis said a regular broth of a boy,
And so I'll do for you
Maybe you don't believe me ?
- BA Too much talk !
Don't worry, that's my house, now in you walk.
(Pseudolus Act III, Sc 2, tr H. L. Rogers)

The needy Parasite who sponges on the wealthy and tries to earn dinner invitations by his wit or flattery is a favourite type with Plautus. Here is one who finding business bad resolves in desperation to hold an auction of his effects

GELASIMUS

G F. L. Ah ! times are changed that phrase we used to meet
Is out of favour now and obsolete —
'Come dine with me please do now, no excuse !
You know I want you sure you won't refuse ?'
To-day they've found a substitute expression
That plays the very deuce with our profession
I'd simply love to dine you if I might

¹ Medea by magic restored Jason's father Aeson to youth. Promising to do the same for Pelias Jason's enemy she induced his daughters to begin the treatment by cutting him to pieces whereat she neglected the cure. The Cook plays on Pelias's ignorance leaving him to draw his own conclusions as to what kind of broth of a boy he will make of him (Rogers and Harley note ad loc)

PYRGOPOLYNICES. ARTOTROGUS (the Parasite) and Soldiers.

PYR. [To his soldiers.] See that the splendour of my shield outshine

The sun's bright radiance, when the clouds are cleared :
That, when 'tis needed in the press of battle,
The foes' array be dazzled by its rays.¹—

[To himself.] Fain would I comfort this brave blade of mine,

Lest he despond in spirit, or lament,
For that I wear him unemployed so long,
Who longs to slash to shreds and slay our foemen.²
[Aloud.] But where is Artotrogus ?

ART. He is here,

Close by a hero fortunate and fearless,
And of a princely form,—a warrior ! such
As Mars himself would not have dared to bring
His prowess in compare with your's.

PYR. [Reminiscent.] Who was it
In Weevilonia's³ flat fields I spar'd,
Where Battleblood and blunderonides,⁴
Great Neptune's grandson, bore the chief command ?

ART. Oh, I remember—doubtless it is he
You mean to speak of, with the golden armour ;—
Whose legions with your breath you puff'd away
Like the light leaves, or chaff before the wind.

PYR. O ! that indeed ! that on my troth was nothing.

ART. Nothing, 'tis true, compar'd with other feats
That I could mention,—[aside.] which you ne'er performed.
[To audience.] Show me whoever can a greater liar,

¹ Array . . . rays. Tyrrell's suggestion for a really bad pun. For a similar assonance, cf. ll. 7-8 'so long, Who longs'.

² A notably alliterative line. Alliteration predominates throughout the scene.

³ Weevilonia. Comic place-name, coined from 'weevil'.

⁴ The original has Bumbomachides Clutomstoriðysarchides.

One fuller of vain boasting than this fellow
 And he shall have me I'll resign me up
 To be his servant

PYR [who has been strutting up and down the stage] Artotrogus!

ART Here Sir—

[playing up] How in the name of wonder was t you broke
 In India with your fist an elephant's arm?

PYR How! arm?

ART His thigh I meant

PYR I was but playing

ART Had you put forth your strength you would have driven
 Your arm quite through his hide bones guts and all

PYR Hold—what was I about to say?

ART I know

What you design'd to say A gallant action!

I well remember—

PYR [suspiciously] What?

ART [somewhat embarrassed] Er—what you did Sir

PYR Hast thou got—

ART [anticipating him] Tablets? Yes Sir here—d'ye want them?—

A pencil too

PYR How rarely thou dost suit

Thy mind to mine!

ART 'Tis fit that I should study

Your inclinations

PYR What dost thou remember?

ART I do remember—let me see—an hundred
 Turkutthroatians—and thirty Sardians—
 And three-score Macedonians—that's the number
 Of persons whom you slaughter'd in one day

PYR What's the sum total of these men?

ART [promptly] Seven thousand.

PYR [calculating] So much it should be—thou art a right accomptant

ART. I have it not in writing, but remember.

PYR. Thou hast an admirable memory.

ART. [aside.] 'Tis sharpened by my stomach.

(Miles Gloriosus, Act I, Sc. 1, adapted from Thornton's translation, 1769.)

Though Plautus does not, of course, draw all his characters on such extravagant lines as his Braggart Warrior or his Miser, it must be admitted that they do not rival the subtle consistency of Terence's. Nevertheless, his robust methods do succeed in presenting a living individuality where the more artistic poet sometimes falls short of success. Plautus had evidently in mind a very vivid conception of Palaestrio when he wrote these lines.

PERIPLECTOMENUS.

[Palaestrio, the slave, goes to the far end of the stage to meditate a plan. Periplectomenus watches.]

PER. Look!—how he stands apart, with brow severe,
As wrapt in thought, and full of cares :—His hand
Knocks at his breast ;¹—I fancy, he's about
To call his heart out. See, he shifts his posture,
And leaning his left elbow on his thigh
The fingers of his right hand he employs,
As it should seem, in reckoning some account ;
And his right thigh he smites so vehemently,
As speaks him with his thoughts dissatisfied :
And now he snaps his fingers : how he's worked !
And ever and anon he shifts his place :
See, see, he nods his head : he likes it not,
What he has hit upon ; for nothing crude
Will he at length bring forth, but well digested.
But see, he builds his head up, and his arm
Serves as a pillar to support his chin.
Fie, fie,—in troth I do not like this building ;
For I have heard a Roman poet² us'd

¹ At his breast—as being the seat of the intellect.

² Roman poet—the barbarus poeta is Naevius (see p. 173). One of the few contemporary references in Plautus.

To lean his head upon his elbow thus,
 And in close custody he liv'd confin'd.
 Bravo ! O brave ! how well he plays his part !
 Ne'er will he rest, till he has perfected
 What he's in search of Ah, he has it sure

(Miles Gloriosus Act II Sc. 2, tr Thornton)

The normal plot of a Plautine comedy winds round the cunning tricks played by slaves upon their masters and round somewhat disreputable love-affairs. The latter at times involve the play in dialogue in which Plautine exuberance overflows more coarsely than amusingly. To this main type two plays stand out in strong contrast. *The Captivus*¹ or The Prisoners of War brings to light an undercurrent of serious morality faintly traceable in the more reflective passages of the other comedies. As the author himself says in the Epilogue,

GENTLEMEN, this play's been written on the lines of modesty,
 Here are found no wiles of women, no gay lovers'
 gallantry,

Here are no affiliations, and no tricks for getting gold,
 No young lover buys his mistress whilst his father is cajoled
 It's not often nowadays that plays are written of this kind,
 In which good folk are made better. Now then if it be your mind,
 And we've pleased you and not bored you kindly undertake our cause

And to modesty award the prize with heartiest applause
 (Captivus, Epilogue, tr Sugden)

The hero of the play is the slave Tyndarus, who changes places with his young master and allows him thus to escape. Plautus gives us an affecting picture of the slave's loyal devotion.

TYNDARUS

TYN If not for sin I perish I don't care !
 But though I perish and he breaks his word
 And doesn't come back here, my joy is this
 My deed will be remembered when I'm dead

¹ It is the one play of Plautus in which there are no female characters.

How I redeemed my lord from slavery,
 And rescued him and saved him from his foes,
 To see once more his father and his home ;
 And how I rather chose to risk my life
 Than let my master perish in his bonds.

(Capitri, Act III, Sc. 5, tr. Sugden.)

The Amphitryo is a sort of mythological travesty.¹ Jupiter disguises himself as Amphitryon, who is absent at the wars, and, accompanied by Mercury, disguised as Sosia, Amphitryon's servant, pays a secret visit to Alcmena. As a result of their union the infant Heracles is born. The real Amphitryon returns unexpectedly, and suspects his wife of infidelity. In the final scene, after much amusing by-play between Mercury and the real Sosia,² the truth is revealed, and the spectators are exhorted to 'give great Jove a clap'. No play of Plautus is harder to classify. The author himself called it a 'tragi-comedy'. Certainly there is real tragedy in the plight of Alcmena herself, the noblest woman that Plautus ever drew, and in her indignant remonstrance with her husband :

ALCMEANA.

A LC. [To Amphitryo.] No such dowry did I bring you as most other women bring.
 But a bosom free from passion and a modest heart and pure,

Fearing God, loving my parents, of my friends' affection sure,
 Pliant to your will and bounteous in kind offices to you.

(Amphitryo, Act II, Sc. 2, tr. Sugden.)

A high ideal of womanhood is set forward in Alcmena's song³ after the departure of the (supposed) Amphitryo :

¹ Cf. p. 168, n. 2.

² Plautus is a master of the situation produced by 'mistaken identity' (cf. the Menæchmi or 'Twin Brothers' on which Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors is closely modelled).

³ The lyrical element in Plautus is very marked. All plays are divided into discrebium (the spoken part, in iambic metre without accompaniment) and cantica—the lyrical part, about three parts of the play, consisting of cantica proper (e.g. Alcmena's song) which was a musical monologue, and all scenes written in non-iambic metre, which were chanted—with gesture—to the music of the flute. The cantica thus comprise the solo and the recitative.

ALCMEVA.

ALC. How few and how poor are the pleasures
That come in the course of our life !
Compared with the troubles ; for so 'tis
Ordained in this region of strife.
The gods have decreed it, that pleasure
Shall always be followed by pain ;
Nay, more inconvenience and trouble
Oft comes, when our wishes we gain
And now that I've learnt by experience,
I find it is true in my case.
For a short time to me 'twas permitted
To gaze on my husband's dear face ;
Just one night he stayed, then he hastened
And suddenly went ere the dawn ;
Yes, he whom I love more than all else
Is gone and has left me forlorn.
Less pleasure I felt at his coming
Than pain now that he is withdrawn.
Yet this makes me glad ; he has conquered the foe,
And home has returned with fresh laurels to show.
Yes, that is my comfort. Then let him begone,
So he may return when the victory's won.
With a brave and a resolute spirit
His absence I'll bear, then I'll see
My husband renowned as a conqueror ;
And that is sufficient for me
For valour's the prize of all prizes the best ;
There's nothing like valour, it must be confest ;
Our freedom, our safety, our goods and our life,
Our home and our children it guards in the strife.
It comprehends all things, all blessings it showers,
If valour, true valour, is ours

(Amphitryo, Act II, Sc. 2, tr. Sugden.)

THR. It is, indeed, something (I know not how)
Peculiar to me, do whate'er I please,
It will appear agreeable.

GNA. In truth
I always have observed it.

THR. Ev'n the King
Held himself much oblig'd, whate'er I did :
Not so to others.

GNA. Men of wit, like you,
The glory, got by others' care and toil,
Often transfer unto themselves.

THR. You've hit it.

GNA. The King then held you——

THR. Certainly.

GNA. Most dear.

THR. Most near. He trusted his whole army to me,
His counsels.—

GNA. Wonderful !

THR. And then, where'er
Satiety of company, or hate
Of business seiz'd him—when he would repose—
As if—you understand me ?

GNA. Perfectly.
When he wou'd—in a manner—clear his stomach
Of all uneasiness.

THR. The very thing.
On such occasions he chose none but me.

GNA. Ah ! there's a king indeed ! a king of taste !

THR. No general man, I promise you.

GNA. Oh no !
He must have been particular indeed,
If he convers'd with you.

THR. [not seeing Gnatho's irony]. The courtiers all
Began to envy me, and rail'd in secret :
I car'd not : whence their spleen increased the more.

Sententiousness is in the forefront of Terence's style. His enlivening hand bestows fresh vitality on the philosophy of saws and aphorisms.

The folly of 'wishing for the moon',

Nay, prithee, master, since the thing you wish
Cannot be had, e'en wish for that which may

(Andria, 305-6, tr. Colman),

the danger of candid friendship,

Complaisance raises friends and truth breeds hate

(Andria, 69, tr. Colman),

the unaccountability of men's tastes,

But so 'tis: many men and many minds:

Each has his fancy

(Phormio, 454, tr. Colman),

—these are a few instances of many. Perhaps the most famous of them is

I am a man and feel for all mankind, a sentiment which gives the key to Terence. His eager interest in everyday humanity is the foundation of his comedies.¹

Prologues in Plautus had served to give a rough outline of the play and afforded him an opportunity of good-natured banter with the audience. Terence, more artistically, leaves the play to tell its own tale and uses the prologue to indicate his sources and to defend his literary principles. In the prologue to The Self-Tormentor, he explains that he wishes to write a comedy of manners, not a boisterous farce:

[Ambivius Turpio, the actor-manager, loquitur.]

NOW follow this play with candour and allow me to represent without interruption a drama of quiet action. The footman on the run, the greybeard in a passion, the greedy sponger, the brazen adventurer, the covetous slave-dealer, are parts that I have no wish to act everlastingly at the top of my voice and with extreme exertion. For my sake bring yourselves to see my plea as a just one that I may have some alleviation of my labours. Yes nowadays writers of new plays have no mercy on an old man. A fatiguing part, and it is me they run to an easy part and another troupe gets it. In the present play you have a natural style. Try the measure of my talents in either line. Set a pattern in my case in order that the young may be more zealous to please you than to please themselves.

¹ Cf. Cicero, de Republica, iv. xi. 'Comedy is an imitation of life, a mirror of fashion, an image of truth.'

(The Self Tormentor Prologue tr J Sargeaunt)

Five of the six prologues contain bitter reference to one Luscius Lanuvinus,¹ a 'malevolent old poet' who had accused the author of plagiarism of faulty plot-construction and of receiving help from his friends of the Scipionic circle.² Terence defends himself against the imputed want of originality by pleading that if he had erred it was only due to inadvertence, and that, in any case,

Nothing is said now but has been said before

(Eunuchus Prologue 41 tr Colman)

As to the charge of *contaminatio*³ of Greek plots he points to the example of Naevius and Plautus who had standardized the practice. Of his relations with his patrons he speaks in a non-committal tone: it is enough for him to find favour with those who are in favour with all Rome' (Adelphi Prologue 16-19). He neither confirms nor denies their collaboration.⁴

Terence's gifts were not such as to make him a popular poet. This he himself realized as the bitter disillusionment of the prologue to the twice rejected *Mother-in-law*⁵ shows. If Horace's picture of the Roman theatre audience may be trusted,

¹ See p. 356 where he comes last but one in Sedigitus's canon.

² With the suggestion that Terence was only the Shakespeare to Scipio's Bacon.

³ The practice of combining or dovetailing sections of two or more plots from the original Greek plays.

⁴ This is a mystery which cannot be solved. The charge against Terence was often repeated. Probably his friends helped him with stray suggestions. The plays themselves reveal no signs of joint authorship (see the discussion in Norwood Art of Terence 1923 Blackwell pp. 132 ff.).

⁵ At the first performance the audience withdrew to witness a popular tight rope dancer. It secured a hearing at the third attempt only thanks to the personal intercession of Turpio.

we need not wonder why Comedy, after Terence, practically ceased to flourish.

THEN too it tries an author's nerve, to find
 That class in numbers strong, though weak in mind,
 The brutal brainless mob, who, if a knight ¹
 Disputes their judgement, bluster and show fight,
 Call in the middle of a play for bears
 Or boxers;—'tis for such the rabble cares.
 But e'en the knights have changed, and now they prize
 Delighted ears far less than dazzled eyes.
 The curtain is kept down ² four hours or more
 While horse and foot go hurrying o'er the floor, . . .
 Whole fleets of ships in long procession pass,
 And captive ivory follows captive brass.

A philosopher returned to earth would laugh
 To see a milk-white elephant, or shape
 Half pard, half camel set the crowd agape.

And the noise in the theatre !

You'd think you heard the Gargan forest roar
 Or Tuscan billows break upon the shore,
 So loud the tumult waxes, when they see
 The show, the pomp, the foreign finery.
 Soon as the actor, thus bedizened, stands
 In public view, clap go ten thousand hands.
 'What said he?' Nought. 'Then what's the attraction?'
 Why,

That woollen mantle with the violet dye.

(Horace, Ep. ii. 1. 182-207, omitting some lines, tr. Conington.)

It is significant of the Roman public's taste—and a tribute to Terence's artistic perfection—that so few authors after him

¹ The better-educated section of the audience.

² With the Romans the curtain was drawn upwards, not, as with us, let fall at the end.

attempted palliatae. More to the popular mind was the vogue of the *togata*¹ which might be described as a popularized palliata. Its scene, tone and manners were frankly Italian though its framework was still modelled on that of the Greek New Comedy. Most of its laughter was raised at the expense of the 'country cousin'—a safe draw at all times on the Roman stage.² Among the writers of *togatae*³ the most popular and most productive seems to have been L. Afranius⁴ (nat. c. 140 B.C.). His style seems to have owed something to Terence.⁵ But much of his matter must have recalled Plautus in his broader moments. His pictures of the low life in Italian country towns were often far from edifying and led to excursions across the borderland of propriety which separates comedy from farce. The result was what might have been expected. Afranius is the last of the Roman comic writers. After him the stream of comedy was rapidly merged in the current of the literary Atellane, losing itself finally in the even more licentious Mime.⁶

¹ i.e. Comedy in Roman dress. Cf. p. 171, n. 2.

² Compare e.g. Plautus's jests at the Praenestine habit of clipping their words (Truculentus 675-91).

³ Titinius (c. 190 c. 150 B.C.) and T. Quinctius Atta (ob. 77 B.C.) both wrote successful togatae. They are praised by Varro (see p. 357) for skill in the portrayal of character. A few fragments survive (Merry pp. 104-7 and 159-60).

⁴ Cicero praises his liveliness and dramatic eloquence (Brutus § 167). Horace records the popular estimation of him as the Roman Menander (Ep. i. 1. 57 quoted on p. 370). Quintilian speaks of his excellence in purely Roman comedy (Inst. Or. x. 1. 100). Over forty play titles remain. For some of the fragments see Merry pp. 161-70.

⁵ Whom he much admires. Terence—who shall find his like? he asks (Merry p. 161 frag. 1). Like Terence he borrowed freely from Menander and was not ashamed to confess the debt (ib. frag. 2).

⁶ See pp. 168 ff.

belong to no recognizable country. Tityrus of the First Eclogue is like Virgil a Mantuan, yet his willows are fed on by bees of Hybla (in Sicily) and these Hyblean bees are warned off the poisonous Jews of Corsica.

Again, though we might expect a poet of nature to write sufficiently 'with his eye on the object' as to describe correctly the scenery of his native country, we observe that the favourite trees of Virgil's Eclogues are the pine the ilex the chestnut, and the beech, none of which grow near Mantua and that the goat-herds pasture their goats amid beetling crags and the shepherds shelter from the midday sun in leafy grottoes—natural features as foreign to the flat, marshy plain of Lombardy as is the sea in which those same shepherds are said to observe their reflections.¹

Nor is this confusion confined to topography. What are we to make of the identification of the lad Daphnis whom the nymphs loved with Julius Caesar, or of Gallus, whom Virgil imitated from the dying shepherd of Theocritus with the elegiac poet who was at the time of Virgil's writing, serving under the future Emperor Augustus against Sextus Pompey? That is the bad side of the picture. But it would be a mistake to be left with the impression that Virgil and the other bucolic poets of Rome were merely clumsy imitators of a species of poetry very much divorced, even in its original form from reality. Plagiarism we must remember, was at Rome not a literary crime but a virtue and inconsistencies troubled the ancients as little as the sea coast of Bohemia offended the Elizabethans. As for the idealization of nature observable in the Roman bucolic writers we can only say that they anticipated a principle laid down by Pope who remarked that poets 'must use some illusion to render a pastoral delightful' by which he meant, as he indeed said exposing the best side only of a shepherd's life and concealing its miseries'. Nor it may be added, did Virgil carry this principle as far as did Pope himself, and in the Roman writer there is still enough love of nature unadorned—though, it is true of nature in her tamer aspect—to justify the admiration which his eclogues have always evoked.

¹ It is only fair to add that these and similar considerations have given rise to a modern theory according to which the eclogues were written at Naples so that the scenery is Neapolitan. (See Tenney Frank's Virgil A Biography.)

Into my running rills. Whom dost thou fear,
Infatuate boy? For woods have been the haunt
Of Trojan Paris and the holy gods.
Let Pallas dwell within the walled towns
Herself hath planted, but the woods 'fore all
Shall be my joy. The grisly lioness
Follows the wolf, the wolf in turn the goat,
The playful goat follows the lucerne-bloom,
And Corydon thee, Alexis: each is drawn
By his peculiar joy. See, now the steers
Drag home the ploughshares hanging from the yoke,
And shadows deepen with departing day.
But me Love burns: how should Love cease to burn?
Ah Corydon, Corydon, what frenzy now
Hath seized thee? To thy leaf-dark elm-tree clings
Thy half-pruned vine. Why dost not rather strive
At least to finish out some common task,
Plaiting soft rush and withy? Another love,
If this disdaineth thee, will soon be thine.

(Ecl. ii, tr. T. S. Royds.)

The following eclogue, generally called the Pollio because addressed to Pollio, the Consul of 40 B. C., has given rise to much controversy. It celebrates the birth of a child and the consequent advent of an age of gold. Who this child was we cannot be sure; though we may safely, despite curious and striking coincidences of the language of Virgil with that of Isaiah, dismiss the idea of Messianic prophecy. The reference is probably to the expected child of Octavian (the future Emperor Augustus) and Scribonia. When this child was born it was not a boy but a girl—the afterwards notorious Julia.

A mighty roll of generations new
 Is now arising Justice now returns
 And Saturn's realm, and from high heaven descends
 A worthier race of men Only do thou
 Smile, chaste Lucina¹ on the infant boy,
 With whom the iron age will pass away
 The golden age in all the earth be born
 For thine Apollo reigns Under thy rule
 Thine, Pollio, shall this glorious era spring
 And the great progress of the months begin
 Under thy rule all footprints of our guilt
 Shall perish and the peaceful earth be freed
 From everlasting fear Thou child, shalt know
 The life of gods and see commingled choir
 Of gods and heroes, and be seen of them,
 And rule a world by righteous father tamed

Then Earth shall haste to bring thee birthday gifts,
 Uncultured Earth the ivy & gadding curls,
 Cyclamen and the water lily twined
 With laughing bear s-breech Uncompelled thy goats
 Shall bring their udders heavy laden home,
 And monstrous lions scare thy herbs no more
 The very cot shall bloom with winsome flowers
 Serpents shall cease the treacherous poison plant
 Shall fail, Assyrian balm shall fill the land
 But when thou hast read the praise of famous men
 And thy sire's deeds and know true excellence,
 The plain shall softly teem with yellowing corn,
 And grapes shall blush upon the unkempt briar,
 And honeydew shall weep from seasoned oaks

Nathless some taint of old iniquity
 Shall stay, to bid men tempt with ships the sea²

¹ The goddess of child birth

² The ancients always retained some vestiges of the idea that sailing the sea was a sin against nature.

' Within¹ our orchard-walls I saw thee first,
A wee child with her mother—(I was sent
To guide you)—gathering apples wet with dew.
Ten years and one I scarce had numbered then ;
Could scarce on tiptoe reach the brittle boughs.
I saw, I felt, I was myself no more.
Begin, my flute, a song of Arcady.

' Now know I what love is. On hard rocks born,
Tmaros, or Rhodope, or they who dwell
In utmost Africa do father him ;
No child of mortal blood or lineage.
Begin, my flute, a song of Arcady.

' In her son's blood a mother dipped her hands
At fierce love's bidding. Hard was her heart too—
Which harder ? her heart or that knavish boy's ?
Begin, my flute, a song of Arcady.

' Now let the wolf first turn and fly the sheep :
Hard oaks bear golden apples : daffodils
Bloom on the alder : and from myrtle-stems
Ooze richest amber. Let owls vie with swans ;
And be as Orpheus—Orpheus in the woods,
Arion with the dolphins—every swain,²
(Begin, my flute, a song of Arcady)

' And earth become mid-ocean. Woods, farewell !
Down from some breezy mountain height to the waves
I'll fling me. Take this last gift ere I die.
Unlearn, my flute, the songs of Arcady.'

Thus Damon. How the other made reply
Sing, sisters. Scarce may all do everything.

¹ Any one who would see Virgil bettering his original should compare this with Theocritus's Eleventh Idyl (l. 25 et sqq.).

² i. e. let the shepherd Tityrus be as good a musician as sylvan Orpheus or marine Arion.

ALPHESIBŒUS.

' Fetch water ' wreath yon altar with soft wool '
 And burn rich vervain and brave frankincense ;
 That I may try my lord's clear sense to warp
 With dark rites Naught is lacking save the songs
 Bring, songs, bring Daphnis from the city home.

' Songs can bring down the very moon from heaven
 Circe with songs transformed Ulysses' crew
 Songs¹ shall in sunder burst the cold grass snake
 Bring, songs, bring Daphnis from the city home

' Three threads about thee, of three several hues,
 I twine ; and thrice—(odd numbers please the god)—
 Carry thy image round the altar stones
 Bring, songs, bring Daphnis from the city home

' Weave, Amaryllis, in three knots three hues.
 Just weave and say " I'm weaving chains of love "
 Bring, songs, bring Daphnis from the city home.

' As this clay hardens, melts this wax, at one
 And the same flame so Daphnis 'neath my love
 Strew meal, and light with pitch the crackling bay.
 Daphnis burns me , for Daphnis burn these bays
 Bring, songs, bring Daphnis from the city home

' Be his such longing as the heifer feels,
 When, faint with seeking her lost mate through copse
 And deepest grove, beside some water-brook
 In the green grass she sinks in her despair,
 Nor cares to yield possession to the night
 Be his such longing mine no wish to heal
 Bring, songs, bring Daphnis from the city home

' Pledges of love, these clothes the traitor once
 Bequeathed me I commit them, Earth, to thee

¹ Songs more accurately charms or incantations This effect of charms upon snakes was believed literally

Here at my threshold. He is bound by these.
Bring, songs, bring Daphnis from the city home.

' These deadly plants great Moeris gave to me,
In Pontus plucked : in Pontus thousands grow.
By their aid have I seen him skulk in woods
A wolf, unsepulchre the buried dead,
And charm to other fields the standing corn.
Bring, songs, bring Daphnis from the city home.

' Go, Amaryllis, ashes in thy hand :
Throw them—and look not backwards—o'er thy head
Into a running stream. These next I'll try
On Daphnis ; who regards not gods nor songs.
Bring, songs, bring Daphnis from the city home.

' See ! While I hesitate, a quivering flame
Hath clutched the wood, self-issuing from the ash.
May this mean good ! Something—for Hylas too
Barks at the gate—it must mean. Is it true ?
Or are we lovers dupes of our own dreams ?
Cease, songs, cease. Daphnis comes from the city home !'
(Ecl. viii, 14-end, tr. C. S. Calverley.)

Moeris and Lycidas beguile the way with singing.

MOERIS.

TIME carries all—our memories e'en—away.
Well I remember how my boyish songs
Would oft outlast the livelong summer day.
And now they're all forgot. His very voice
Hath Moeris lost : on Moeris wolves have looked.¹
—But oft thou'lt hear them from Menalcas yet.

¹ There was an old superstition that if a wolf saw a man before the man saw it the man became dumb. Cf. W. Morris in Life and Death of Jason, 'sure the grey wolf hath seen Medea to-day'.

LYCIDAS

Thy pleas but draw my passion out And lo !
 All hushed to listen is the wide sea floor,
 And laid the murmurings of the souging winds
 And now we re half way there I can descry
 Bianor's grave Here, Mæris where the swains
 Are raking off the thick leaves let us sing
 Or if we fear lest night meanwhile bring up
 The rain clouds, singing let us journey on—
 (The way will seem less tedious)—journey on Singing and I will ease thee of thy load

MÆRIS

Cease lad We'll do what lies before us now
 Then sing our best, when comes the Master home
 (Ecl ix 51-end, tr C S Calverley)

The next is one of the most beautiful but at the same time one of the most confused of Virgil's Fælogues. The poet in the person of a shepherd sings of Gallus and his unrequited love. The prototype of Gallus is the dying shepherd, Daphnis, of Theocritus's First Idyl, but Gallus himself is the poet friend of Virgil, C Cornelius Gallus (cf p 131). Hence he appears now as dying under a rock in Arcadia now as serving in an Italian campaign.

It is scarcely necessary to call attention to the likeness of the opening (itself taken directly from Theocritus) to Milton's Lycidas.

WHERE were ye, Naiad nymphs, in grove or glen,
 When Gallus died of unrequited love ?
 Not helights of Pindus or Parnassus no
 Aonian Aganippe¹ kept ye then
 Him e'en the laurels wept and myrtle groves
 Stretch'd neath the lone cliff piny Mænalus
 And chill Lycæum's stones all wept for him
 The sheep stood round They think not scorn of us

¹ A spring in Boeotia

And think not scorn, O priest of song, of them.
Sheep fair Adonis fed beside the brooks.
The shepherds came. The lazy herdsmen came.
Came, from the winter acorns dripping-wet,
Menalcas. 'Whence,' all ask, 'this love of thine?'
Apollo came: and, 'Art thou mad,' he saith,
'Gallus? Thy love, through bristling camps and snows,
Tracks now another's steps.' Silvanus came,
Crowned with his woodland glories: to and fro
Rocked the great lilies and the fennel bloom.
Pan came, Arcadia's Pan: (I have seen him, red With elder-berries and with cinnabar:)
'Is there no end?' quoth he: 'Love heeds not this:
Tears sate not cruel Love: nor rills the leas,
Nor the bees clover, nor green boughs the goat.'
But he rejoins sad-faced: 'Yet sing this song
Upon your hills, Arcadians! none but ye
Can sing. Oh! pleasantly will rest my bones
If pipe of yours shall one day tell my loves.
Oh! had I been as you are! kept your flocks,
Or gleaned, a vintager, your mellow grapes!
A Phyllis, an Amyntas—whom you will—
Had been my passion—what if he be dark?
Violets are dark and hyacinths are dark.—
And now should we be sitting side by side,
Willows around us and a vine o'erhead,
He carolling, or plucking garlands she.'
—Here are cold springs, Lycōris¹, and soft lawns,
And woods: with thee I'd here decay and die.
Now, for grim war accoutred, all for love,
In the fray's centre I await the foe:
Thou, in a far land—out the very thought!—
Gazest (ah wilful!) upon Alpine snows
And the froz'n Rhine—without me—all alone!

¹ Gallus's lady-love.

May that frost harm not thee ! that jagged ice
 Cut ne'er thy dainty feet ! I'll go, and play
 My stores of music—fashioned for the lyre
 Of Chalcis¹—on the pipe of Arcady
 My choice is made In woods, 'mid wild beasts dens
 I'll bear my love, and carve it on the trees
 That with their growth my loves may grow and grow
 Banded with nymphs I'll roam o'er Mænalus
 Or hunt swift boars, and circle with my dogs
 Unrecking of the cold, Parthenia's glades
 Already over crag and ringing grove
 I am borne in fancy laugh as I let loose
 The Cretan arrow from the Parthian bow —

Pooh ! will this heal thy madness ? will that god
 Learn mercy from the agonies of men ?

'Tis past again nymphs, music, fail to please
 Again I bid the very woods begone
 No deed of mine can change him tho' I drink
 Hebrus in mid December tho' I plunge
 In snows of Thrace the dripping winter's snows
 Tho', when the parched bark dies on the tall elm
 Neath Cancer's star I tend the Æthiop's sheep
 Love's lord of all Let me too yield to Love

(Ed. x 9-69, tr. C. S. Calverley)

CALPURNIUS, the author of seven eclogues is a poet of whose life we know singularly little. Even the date of his birth is a mystery, and critics have placed him as early as the beginning of Nero's reign (A.D. 54) and as late as the reign of Carus (A.D. 282-3). There is no trustworthy external evidence, and all we gather from the poet himself is that he lived and wrote under a young prince recently advanced to the purple. Besides the two emperors already mentioned, Domitian (81-96) and Commodus (180-92) have been suggested as possibilities, but we may ¹ Another reference to Gallus's translation of the poems of Euphron of Chalcis.

AMINTAS

Yea every country every tribe
 Worship and praise to Him ascribe
 And He is by all gods beloved
 To whom you ascribe thus unmoved
 Do reverence from the sluggish earth
 Warm'd to new life fresh flowers had birth
 When she had only heard his name
 The forest stirred by his acclaim
 Her boskage lavishly perfumes
 And awe-charmed trees renew their blooms

CORYDON

Soon as the lands began to feel
 His godlike influence o'er them steal
 Furrows which we had seen belie
 Our hopes in new fertility
 Luxuriate beans full podded yield
 No vainous rattling and the field
 Chokes not with darnel weed malign,
 Nor fears the oats unfruitful shine

AMINTAS.

Our swains need fear no more to ply
 Their spades as under penalty
 But if Dame Fortune's gifts are kind
 May freely spend the gold they find
 Nor need the ploughman as of yore
 Upturning loosened clods deplore
 Lest his share's jarring note betray
 Some obstacle that blocks his way
 For openly he leans him now
 More and more firmly on his plough

STORY-TELLING AND THE NOVEL

Though the voice of modern schools
Has demurred,
By the dreamy Asian creed
'Tis averred
That the souls of men, released
From their bodies when deceased,
Sometimes enter in a beast—
Or a bird.

(AUSTIN DOBSON, Avicce.)

ROMANTIC fiction, as we know it, was almost a stranger to classical Greece, and among the Romans a late arrival. For centuries story-telling of a literary kind meant the making and remaking of myths and national legends in traditional verse-forms. These stories did not condescend below the adventures of divine beings, the gods and demi-gods or 'heroes' with whom national history was linked; for they were mostly written to be sung or recited at the open-air festivals of small city-states, which demanded of poets not any extravagance of individual fancy, but an individual expression of the civic faith. Tales of fictitious adventure would have been out of place, unless (as in Comedy) they had some bearing on public affairs; and another source of modern romance—the sympathetic treatment of love—was precluded in the non-Dorian states,¹ such as Athens, by the subjection of women.

Artistic prose was not perfected till the fifth century B. C., and in Greek literature did not displace poetry in the purely imaginative field for some six hundred years: then at last was the Greek novel able to develop.² But only this formal convention

¹ The Dorian poet Stesichorus (c. 640–555 B. C.) of Himera in Sicily is known to have written tales of love in lyric form; Antimachus of Colophon in Asia Minor (fl. 404 B. C.) in elegiacs. A Hesiodic poem of earlier date, with the prosaic title A List of Women, included the story of Apollo's love for the mortal maid Coronis, which recurs in Ovid.

² The Cyropaedia (Education of Cyrus) by Xenophon (c. 425–350 B. C.) is a kind of historical novel; and a papyrus has been found which links it in certain ways to the later Greek romances. On the subject generally, cf. Prof. J. S. Phillimore's article 'The Greek Romances' in English Literature and the Classics (Oxford, Clarendon Press, 1912); also W. R. Hardie's 'The Vein of Romance' in Lectures on Classical Subjects (Macmillan, 1903), to both of which acknowledgements are due.

survived the decay of the city state. Euripides had shown a tendency to humanize tragic drama, and in Hellenistic times the character sketch, the Comedy of Manners (with an assertive love-interest), erotic elegy, and pastoral poems are all clear signs of a new movement which even permitted the intrusion of romantic psychology in Epic. It is clear, too, that by this time a reading public was well established.

Meanwhile the Alexandrian poet Callimachus (c. 310-235 B.C.) explored the local legends of common folk. These survived by oral tradition and in the digests of prose mythographers, and in them lay romance of another kind dependent as a rule upon the marvellous or supernatural, but including very often a tale of love. His example was followed by Nicander of Colophon and other poets of Asia Minor who took pleasure in describing miraculous changes of colour and shape. Little is known of their tales, but some of them must have borne a family likeness to our Just so Stories and some no doubt reflected the rude belief that there might be such a thing as a man's soul being loose from his body and going out and in like a bird out of its nest and back.¹ Others might take us back to totemism and the days when there was no great distinction between animals and men. Before turning to Latin literature, it is worth noticing that Romance with its mixed strains of love and the magical or bizarre, was born on those fringes of Hellenism where East meets West and that it was not always a presentable child.

The Romans had little or no mythology of their own for they thought of their gods in early days as numina or 'spirits', and did not credit them with human form. But from about 509 B.C. onwards these spirits were gradually identified with supposed Greek equivalents and took over their personal attributes and mythical history—a process to which all the Roman poets contributed. Before long the myths and national legends treated by the poets of classical Greece became as outworn as the creeds they had once enshrined. It was in the time of Catullus (87-c. 54 B.C.²) when Alexandrian models came into fashion that a romancer might have had his opportunity, but the minor mythology quarried by Callimachus and his like remained the property of a literary clique who used it more by way of illustration and allusion than as material for story telling. Italian legends had no wider currency except among antiquarians such

¹ George Eliot Silas Marner ch. 1

² See pp. 21, 62 ff., 130 ff.

The next scene, where Actaeon (in all innocence) enters the cave, reveals something of that delight in colour so noticeable in Ovid¹ and so rare in other classical writers. Pose as well as colour may often have been suggested by famous paintings of antiquity : and through Ovid some reflection of these lost works may be seen in most of the picture-galleries of Europe :

At sight of man

They smite upon their breasts : the whole wood rings
With sharp dismay : and all, with mind to shield
Diana, closely cling. But towering high
The goddess overpeers them, head and neck.
Espied, she takes such colour in her cheek
As sunbeams paint upon the fronting clouds,
Or in the mantling morn Aurora wears.

(iii. 178-85.)

At loss for bow and arrow, Diana throws water in Actaeon's face, with the taunt that now he may boast, if he can, of what he has seen. Then follow his metamorphose and punishment :

SO she : and on his wet brow makes to spring
An old hart's horns : adds inches to his neck :
Sharpens the ear-tips : fingers turns to feet,
Arms into shanks, white skin to dappled hide :
And in his heart plants Fear. Away he flies
That was Autonoe's son, and in his flight
Marvels at his own swiftness. Ah, what grief
He would have spoken when the clear stream showed
His horns ; but voice was wanting, save a sigh ;
And strange the cheeks he waters—human mind
Alone remains of all that once was man.

Now where to fly ? Back to his royal home ?
Or lurk in covert ? Shame the one forbids,

¹ Elsewhere Ovid compares a blush (with more originality) to 'the red-under-white of the moon in part eclipse'—a colour visible only through glasses in this country ; and Atalanta in the race has 'the glow of sunshine that floats on a marble floor beneath purple awning'.

The other, fear ; and while he weighs his doubts,
 The kennel views him Blackfoot opens first,
 Of Spartan kind ; and Tricer, a good nose
 From Cretan Crossos Wind swift on the trail
 Come Ravener, Gazelle and Mountaineer,
 Arcadians all, great Fawn-bane, snarling Slouch
Tornado, Bird wing fleet, keen-scented Chase,
Ranger, but lately gashed by a wild boar
Gully, the bitch that had a wolf to sire
Shepherdess ; Pounce—two cubs beside her ran Gaunt Catch, from Sicyon, Courier, Gnash, and Spot
Tigress and Puissance Blanche, snow-white ; and Soot,
Spartan, strong limbed, with tireless Hurricane ;
 And Swift, and racing She wolf—at her side
Cypriot, her brother, Snatch, a sable mask
 Cut with a gleam of white Cole, shag haired Rugg,
Fury and White-tooth, bred of Spartan dam,
 Their sire a Cretan, Blab, of the ringing note,
 —Others to name were long By crag, by cliff,
 By desperate rocks, rough ways and ways denied
 Hotly they fling He, in familiar fields
 Where once he wont to follow, flies his hounds,
 And flying ' Know Actæon,' would exclaim,
 ' Know me, your master !' Dumb was his desire
 Full cry ! The echoes waken ! Collier first
 Haunch holds him, Kill-buck next, with Mountain lad
 Fast in a shoulder Over a scarp all three
 Had cut, and crossed him—laggards at the start
 Quick to the kill come all their master held,
 And lock their fangs in flesh Now room is none
 For mouths to wound him and aloud he moans
 —No human sound, yet never hart moaned so !
 Hills known of old, echo his cry He falls
 Suppliant on his knees, and wanting hands
 To beg their mercy, dumbly turns his head

This said, the weeping Youth again return'd
 To the clear Fountain, where again he burn'd ;
 His Tears defac'd the Surface of the Well,
 With Circle after Circle, as they fell :
 And now the lovely Face but half appears,
 O'er-run with Wrinkles, and deform'd with Tears.

(iii. 463-76, tr. Addison.)

At death he too suffers metamorphosis :

HIS last words were, still hanging o'er his shade :
 ' Ah, Boy, belov'd in vain ! ' So Echo said :
 ' Farewell.' ' Farewell,' sigh'd she. Then down he lies :
 Death's cold hand shuts his self-admiring eyes :
 Which now eternally their gazes fix
 Upon the waters of infernal Styx.
 The woeful Naiades lament the dead
 And their clipped hair upon their brother spread.
 The woeful Dryades partake their woes :
 With both sad Echo joins at every close.
 The funeral pile prepar'd, a hearse they brought
 To fetch his body, which they vainly sought.
 In stead whereof a yellow flower was found,
 With tufts of white about the button crown'd.

(iii. 499-510, tr. Sandys.)

Among the peasants of his native place, Sulmona, Ovid still passes for a magician :¹ an error which may be partly due to his intimate stories of the Crimean sorceress Medea. He has told us how Aeson, her husband's father, was about to die, and how she agreed to rejuvenate him. We will follow her out into the night :

THREE nights yet wanted, ere the Moon could join
 Her growing horns. When with replenished shine
 She viewed the earth, the Court she leaves ; her hair
 Untressed, her garments loose, her ankles bare :

¹ Cf. Prof. D. A. Slater, Ovid in the Metamorphoses (Cambridge, University Press, n.d.), p. 2—a most suggestive sketch.

The scaly skins of small Ginyphean snakes.
 A Crow's old head, and pointed beak, was cast
 Among the rest ; which had nine ages passed.¹
 These, and a thousand more, without a name,
 Were thus prepared by the barbarous Dame
 For human benefit. Th' ingredients now
 She mingles with a withered Olive bough.
 Lo ! from the cauldron the dry stick receives
 First verdure ; and a little after, leaves ;
 Forthwith, with over-burd'ning Olives decked,
 The skipping froth which under flames eject,
 Upon the ground descended in a dew ;
 Whence vernal flowres and springing pasture grew.
 This seen, she cuts the old man's throat ; out-scrus'd
 His scarce-warm blood, and her receipt (infus'd)
 His mouth or wound sucked in. His beard and head
 Black hair forthwith adorns, the hoary shed.

(vii. 257-289, tr. Sandys.)

It may well be asked how stories such as we have read can form part of an epic. One answer is that philosophy made all things possible—but that must wait. Meanwhile we may turn back to the First Book, where myths of Apollo, the chosen god of Augustus, receive a place of honour. In one of these we are told how Cupid, to avenge a slight, inspired Apollo with fruitless love for the nymph Daphne, who was changed to a laurel to escape his pursuit. The scene of flying nymph and 'demon lover' is common in the 'Metamorphoses'; but here Ovid is able to add an unusual epilogue. Daphne has been praying to her father, the river-god Peneus, for deliverance :

SCARCE had she finished, when her feet she found
 Benumbed with cold, and fastened to the ground :
 A filmy rind about her body grows :
 Her hair to leaves, her arms extend to boughs :
 Her feet, so swift to fly, are stayed in roots :

¹ i.e. the head of a crow which had outlived nine human generations.

Where was her face there spring the highest shoots
 The nymph is all into a Laurel gone
 The smoothness of her skin remains alone¹
 Yet Phoebus loves her still and casting round
 Her bole his arms some little warmth he found.
 The tree still panted in the unfinished part
 Not wholly vegetive and heaved her heart
 He fixed his lips upon the trembling rind
 It swerved aside and his embrace declined
 To whom the god Because thou canst not be
 My mistress I espouse thee for my tree
 Thou shalt be mine a crown to wear for ever
 About my brows entwined my harp my quiver
 Captains of Rome shall bind with thee their heads
 When up the steep a pomp triumphant spreads,
 Guarding Augustus gate shalt thou be seen
 This side and that the civic oak between²

(l. 54^c-63)³

Such myths cannot easily be made to foreshadow imperial destinies. But in Book IV he has better material. It is largely devoted to legends of the man god Hercules with whom Augustus as a Saviour and Benefactor of mankind, was sometimes compared and in fact the subject peoples of Rome made an easy transition from old hero-cults to the deification of their rulers. Notice how Ovid describes the transfiguration

WHATEVER flame might raze the Fire-god's might Burned clean away No human semblance now
 Of Hercules remains no mortal frame
 Built in his mother's likeness all is gone
 Save the pure lineaments of his father Jove
 And as some serpent when his aged slough

See note on p. 80

¹ Two bay trees were planted in front of the gate-posts of the Imperial palace on the Palatine. The oak chaplet, given to those who had saved the lives of citizens in battle signified that the emperor was the Saviour (in the Hellenistic title) of his subjects.

² Tr. II. 1-4 7 16 by Dryden.

Is cast, in richness of his springtime moves,
 Flashing his scales renewed ; so Tiryns' lord¹
 Knows a new vigour in his Better Part,
 Its mortal mould laid by. In stature risen
 August he grows, clothed on with massive might,
 A god tremendous ; whom, through bellying clouds
 Upborne by horses four, the Almighty Sire
 Lifts heavenward, there to shine among the stars.

(ix. 262-73.)

And then a characteristic conceit—'Atlas perceived the load!'

Shortly afterwards comes the story of Dryope. She was bringing garlands to the nymphs of a sacred pool, when to please her child she plucked some gay lotus berries from the bank. The bough dropped blood and the whole tree shuddered : for it embodied the nymph Lotis—a second Daphne. Dryope became rooted to the spot, and took the same form as the injured nymph. There is a simplicity about her last words that Golding's version² does not belie. Her sister Iole tells the tale :

'MY sister now could show
 No part which was not wood except her face. A dew of tears

Did stand upon the wretched leaves late formed of her hairs ;
 And while she might, and while her mouth did give her way to speak,

With such complaint as this her mind she last of all did break—

" If credit may be given to such as are in wretchedness,

I swear by God I never yet deserved this distress.

I suffer pain without desert. My life hath guiltless been.

And if I lie, I would these boughs of mine which now are green

Might wither'd be, and I hewn down and burned in the fire.

This infant from his mother's breasts remove you, I desire :

And put him forth to nurse, and cause him underneath my tree

¹ Hercules was the son of Alcmena, a princess of Tiryns, and Jove.

² See p. 249, note 1. The spelling has here been modernized.

Oft times to suck, and oftentimes to play And when that he Is able for to speak, I pray you let him greet me here,
 And sadly say ' In this same trunk is hid my mother dear.'
 But learn him for to shun all ponds and pulling flow'rs from trees,
 And let him in his heart believe that all the shrubs he sees
 Are bodies of the Goddesses Adieu dear husband, now,
 Adieu, dear father and adieu dear sister And in you
 If any love of me remain defend my boughs I pray
 From wound of cutting hook and axe, and bite of beast for aye
 And for I cannot stoop to you, raise you yourselves to me
 And come and kiss me while I may yet touch'd and kneed be
 And lift me up my little boy I can no longer talk
 For now about my hily neck as if it were a stalk
 The tender rind begins to creep and overgrows my top
 Remove your fingers from my face—the spreading bark doth stop
 My dying eyes without your help

(ix 367-91)

The touch of pantheism, half ironic, should not be missed. It is not unrelated to the fashionable philosophy of the time, by which the change of a soul to a star was made plausible. 'Ether,' the burning and luminous fluid which fills the celestial spaces, was regarded as the single essence of all things—of reason, god and nature—and the sphere of the fixed stars as the seat of the directing reason of the world. The soul of man was but a parcel of this ether—so that the great and good once freed from earthly dross might rise up and shine among the blessed.¹

Ovid reflects these doctrines in his account of creation in Book I—but combines them with others derived from the later followers of the ancient sage Pythagoras, who formed a kind of religious order and were able to interpret the myths of all countries in a manner convenient to their system. When we have passed by way of the legends of the Trojan war (Books XII-XIII), a résumé of the Aeneid (XIII-XIV) and the apotheoses of Aeneas and Romulus—those earlier Men of Destiny—to the generations, too, are less tolerant of its failings in composition and style, and misdoubt the irreverence of Ovid's wit—all with some justice.

¹ Cf. Cumont, After-life in Roman Paganism (Yale University Press 1922) pp. 24-30.

The conventions of form and fashion which Ovid obeyed in presenting his short stories as elegies or epic were inherited from Alexandria, and help to explain, as we have seen, the non-appearance of the novel in Hellenistic Greek at a time when all the constituents of romance were present. Yet novelettes must have lived and multiplied in the back-streets of literature, at any rate in the second century B. C., after Aristides of Miletus, in Asia Minor, had produced six books or more of Milesian Tales.¹ At Rome these found a translator in the historian Lucius Cornelius Sisenna (119-67 B. C.). They were tales of love and adventure, often diverting, but disreputable enough to provoke the scorn of the Parthian vizier who found a copy in the kit of a Roman officer on the fatal field of Carrhae (53 B. C.).

Meanwhile the romantic imagination found a more dignified but profitless outlet in the Declaimed Essay of the rhetoricians. It has been truly said that 'more and more of the components of literature were being brought into the net of the Professors of Style; they taught the art of story-telling and the art of analysing and displaying motives of character'—on the principle that 'applied psychology is the essence of good oratory'.² To illustrate this point, let us anticipate our subject with a quotation from the first Roman novel. A candid critic is here addressing a Professor from the local college of Rhetoric:

'Surely our rhetoricians are tormented by some new type of Fury when they exclaim "These wounds I received in the fight for popular rights; you, Sirs, cost me this eye; is there no one will lead me to my children? My thews are cut, my strength is taken from under me!"'³ Even these speeches could be endured if they paved the way for aspirants to oratory. As it is, this inflated matter and empty rattle of choice phrases has ¹ These are the forerunners of such works as the medieval Gesta Romanorum, the Facetiae of Poggio, Boccaccio's Decameron, the Heptameron of Margaret of Navarre, the Ragionamenti of Aretino, the Cent Nouvelles Nouvelles, and the Contes érotiques of Balzac. (Cp. S. G. Owen, P. Ovidi Nasonis Tristium Lib. II (Oxford, Clarendon Press, 1924), p. 227.

² Prof. J. S. Phillimore, op. cit., p. 96.

³ The maimed soldier returning from the wars to a faithless wife, whom he orders a son to execute, was a favourite subject for declamation. Here the cadences employed ('taken from/under me') are also favourites.

but one result—no sooner do pupils find themselves in a court of law than they think they have been carried into another world. In my opinion college makes perfect fools of our young men, because they neither hear nor see anything of real life there—nothing but pirates standing in fetters on the beach, tyrants writing orders for sons to behead their fathers, oracles prescribing the sacrifice of virgins—three or more, to avert a plague—honeyed rounds of verbrage—every word and act sprinkled, as it were, with poppy-seed and sesame! Students nurtured in this atmosphere can no more be sensible than kitchen folk can smell sweet. (Petronius, § 1)

We have parted company with Ovid, but it is worth noticing that as a student he showed great skill in declamations that gave scope for emotional treatment, and is said to have made of them something very like vers libre.¹ Had he not been a born versifier, and bound by the traditions of literary form, he might well have written a prose romance developing the highly coloured and fictitious rhetorical themes. As it happened it was reserved for another Roman, GAIUS² PETRONIUS (ob. A.D. 66),³ to discover the new genre, and he approached it (as our first quotation suggests) from a very different angle.

His Satyricon was a long work in some twenty books, of which there remain only selections from Books XV and XVI. In form it is a descendant of Menippean satire—i.e. a mixture of prose and verse—and it is not dissimilar in subject matter and style. But themes or episodes that Varro might have treated separately⁴ are presented as chapters or some lesser unit in a picaresque⁵ novel which follows the adventures of Encolpius, the narrator, his slave-boy and favourite Giton, and friend Ascyltus, a Roman knight. The style bears a marked resemblance to that of Seneca's *Apocolocyntosis*⁶—perhaps owing to a Menippean tradition. But here it is given ampler room for display, ranging with ease from the coarsest sea port idiom,

¹ There were two kinds of declamations—controversiae (debates) which dealt with points of law and required the knowledge and careful reasoning necessary in preparing a case, and suasoriae or exercises in imaginary advice given often to mythical or historical characters e.g. Helen or Hannibal at some crisis of their lives. The former kind were not to Ovid's taste unless they were capable of psychological treatment.

² His first name is conjectural.

³ See pp. 377 ff.

⁴ See p. 285 and cf. Prof. W. C. Summers The Silver Age of Latin Literature (London Methuen 1920) p. 235.

⁵ From Spanish pícaro a rogue.

⁶ See p. 299.

through the polite colloquialism of the time, and up along the edges of parody to some very graceful verse. Apart from traces of a central *motif*¹ there is nothing which can be called a plot; and the inclusion of at least three Milesian tales is some index of the general tone. But much is redeemed by the satiric power of Petronius and his artistic conscience. There is every reason to identify the author with the pro-consul of Bithynia and consul-elect, who, by Tacitus' account, gave many proofs of administrative capacity, but preferred to 'idle into fame' as 'Master of Ceremonies' or 'Critic of Taste' in the court of Nero. There he 'lapsed into the habit or assumed the mask of vice', and finally took his own life (in the best manner) by Imperial command.

Persius,² writing at about this time, had turned to satire in disgust at poetry and declamation that were bankrupt alike of moral and literary value. Petronius, with aesthetic rather than moral sensibilities, obeys the same instinct, but has every advantage not only in knowledge of the world, but in method. Satire ties his romance to earth: and romance imposes the true satiric detachment. This is best shown in the episode of Trimalchio's dinner-party, which forms almost a third part of the extant work. Not even Horace can expose folly and bad taste with so impersonal an air; and in power of characterization he is not superior. Trimalchio is a rich freedman of Asiatic origin, resident at Cumae—a country cousin of those who were to raise the spleen of Juvenal. Encolpius describes the beginning of the feast:

THESE delicacies were engaging our attention, when Trimalchio rode in to the accompaniment of music, reclining on a lot of tiny cushions. We stifled our laughter, for we were taken by surprise. He was dressed in a scarlet cloak, and his bald head just popped over it; round his neck, which was wrapped in heavy scarves, he had a napkin with a broad purple stripe and fringes all round it. On the little finger of his left hand he had a huge gilt ring and on the top joint of his next finger a smaller one which seemed real gold, but closer inspection proved it to be set round with metal foil cut into stars. Not content with this ostentation, he had a bright gold bracelet on his bare arm and an ivory bangle with a metal clasp. Picking his teeth with a silver quill, he remarked, 'I didn't like to keep you hanging about any longer without me gentlemen and though I didn't fancy coming to dinner yet, I have sacrificed my own amusement. Pardon me if I finish my game.' There was a valet following him with a backgammon board of terebinth and crystal pieces, and—such a pretty idea—for black and white counters he had gold and silver coins. So he played away, practising his vocabulary to himself, we were still occupied with the hors-d'œuvre, when a basket was brought in on a tray with a wooden hen in it spreading her wings as they do when they are sitting. Loud music! Two servants came up and began scratching about in the straw. Then they pulled out peahen's eggs and passed them round to the guests. Trimalchio deigned a glance for this turn and observed 'My idea, gentlemen to have peahen's eggs hatched by a barn-door fowl. Damme, I'm afraid they're addled, let's see if we can still suck them.' We took our spoons (weighing at least half a pound) and thumped the eggs (which were lumps of rich meal), I was just going to throw mine away, fearing it had got a chicken in it already. But I heard a guest, an old hand, observe, 'There's some treat here I know! So I pushed through the shell with my finger, and found a fat fig pecker rolled up in spiced yolk of egg. Trimalchio now broke off his game and asked for all the same dishes, shouting out that we were all free to take another glass of punch if we liked. (§§ 32-4 tr H. L. Rogers and T. R. Harley.)

¹ There is possibly a burlesque of the plot of the Odyssey, in which a god's wrath pursues the hero over land and sea.

² See p. 301.

During the temporary absence of Trimalchio, the diners exchange some local gossip rich in characterization. Here Ganymedes, a freedman, interrupts some rather maudlin reminiscences

'YOU go talking about things which are neither in heaven nor earth and none of you care all the time how the price of food pinches. I swear I cannot get hold of a mouthful of bread to-day. And how the drought goes on! There has been a famine for a whole year now. Damn the magistrates who play Scratch my back, and I'll scratch yours, in league with the bakers. So the little people come off badly ; for the jaws of the upper classes are always keeping carnival. I do wish we had the bucks I found here when I first came out of Asia. That was life. If the flour was any but the finest, they beat those vampires into a jelly, until they put the fear of God into them. I remember Safinius : he used to live then by the old arch when I was a boy. He was more of a mustard-pot than a man : used to scorch the ground wherever he trod. Still he was straight ; you could trust him, a true friend : you would not be afraid to play at morra¹ with him in the dark. How he used to dress them down in the senate-house, every one of them, never using roundabout phrases, making a straightforward attack ! And when he was pleading in the courts his voice used to swell like a trumpet. Never any sweating or spitting : I imagine he had a touch of the Asiatic style.² And how kindly he returned one's greeting, calling every one by name quite like one of ourselves ! So at that time food was dirt-cheap. You could buy a larger loaf for twopence than you and your better half together could get through. One sees a bun bigger now. Lord, things are worse every day. This town goes downhill like the calf's tail. But why do we put up with a magistrate not worth three peppercorns, who cares more about putting twopence in his purse than keeping us alive ? He sits grinning at home, and pockets more money a day than other people have for a fortune. I happen to know where he came by a thousand in gold. If we had any spunk in us he would not be so pleased with himself. Nowadays people are lions in their own houses, and foxes out of doors. I have already eaten my rags, and if these prices keep up I shall have to sell my cottages. Whatever is to happen if neither the gods nor man will take pity on this town ? As I hope to have joy of my children, I believe all these things come from Heaven.

¹ In this game one player quickly exposed a number of fingers which the other, sitting opposite and holding his disengaged hand, had simultaneously to guess. Cheating was easy, even in daylight.

² The Asiatic style of oratory (see p. 444) was anything but straightforward. The speaker is airing an insufficient knowledge.

For no one now believes that the gods are gods. There is no fasting done, no one cares a button for religion. They all shut their eyes and count their own goods. In old days the mothers in their best robes used to climb the hill with bare feet and loose hair, pure in spirit, and pray Jupiter to send rain. Then it used promptly to rain by the bucket. It was now or never, and they all came home, wet as drowned rats. As it is, the gods are gouty in the feet because we are sceptics. So our fields lie baking——'

'Oh, don't be so gloomy,' said Echion, the old clothes-dealer. 'There's ups and there's downs,' as the country bumpkin said when he lost his spotted pig.'

(§§ 44-5, tr. M. Heseltine.)

Later Niceros, another guest, is prevailed upon by his host to tell a stock anecdote.

WHILE I was still a slave we were living in a narrow street, the house now belongs to Gavilla. There it was God's will that I should fall in love with the wife of Terentius the inn-keeper, you remember her, Melissa of Tarentum, a pretty round thing. Now one day her husband died on the estate.¹ So I buckled on my shield and greaves and schemed how to come at her, and as you know one's friends turn up in tight places. My master happened to have gone to Capua to look after some silly business or other. I seized my opportunity, and persuaded a guest in our house to come with me as far as the fifth milestone. He was a soldier and as brave as Hell. So we trotted off about cockcrow, the moon shone like high noon. We got among the tombstones.² My man went aside to look at the epitaphs. I sat down with my heart full of song and began to count the graves. Then when I looked round at my friend he stripped himself and put all his clothes by the roadside. My heart was in my mouth, but I stood like a dead man. He made a ring of water round his clothes and suddenly turned into a wolf. Please do not think I am joking. I would not lie about this for any fortune in the world. But as I was saying, after he had turned into a wolf, he began to howl, and ran off into the woods. At first I hardly knew where I was, then I went up to take his clothes; but they had all turned into stone. No one could be nearer dead with terror than I was. But I drew my sword and went slaying shadows all the way till I came to my love's house. I went in like a corpse, and nearly gave up the ghost, the sweat ran down my legs, my eyes were dull, I could hardly be revived. My dear Melissa was surprised at my being out so late, and said, 'If you had come earlier you might at least have helped us; a wolf got into the house and worried all our sheep, and let their blood like a butcher. But he did not make fools of us, even though he got off; for our slave made a hole in his neck with a spear.' When I heard this, I could not keep my eyes shut any longer, but at break of day I rushed back to my master Gaius's house like a defrauded publican, and when I came to the place where the clothes were turned into stone I found nothing but a pool of blood. But when I reached home my soldier was lying in bed like an ox, with a doctor looking after his neck. I realized that he was a werewolf, and I never could sit down to a meal with him afterwards, not if you had killed me first.'

¹ Terentius was a slave managing the tavern for his master. (M H.)

² They would be by the roadside. (M H.)

(§§ 61-2, tr. M. Heseltine.)

Trimalchio can cap this with tales of witchcraft—a straw-changeling, &c.; but the story of his own life is perhaps more interesting. It is punctuated with side-thrusts at his wife Fortunata, who had engaged him in a drunken brawl, and received not only a goblet in the face, but a threat that her statue should have no place upon his tomb. Habinnas (a monumental mason) has tried to restore the peace, but her outcry is still audible as the threat is driven home and Trimalchio proceeds:

IS that your feeling, my high-heeled hussy? I advise you to chew what you have bitten off, you vulture, and not make me show my teeth, my little dear: otherwise you shall know what my anger is. Mark my words: when once my mind is made up, the thing is fixed with a ten inch nail But we will think of the living Please make yourselves comfortable, gentlemen I was once just what you are, but by my own merits I have come to this A bit of sound sense is what makes men, the rest is all rubbish "I buy well and sell well" some people will tell you differently I am bursting with happiness What, you snorer in bed, are you still whining? I will take care that you have something to whine over Well, as I was just saying, self-denial has brought me into this fortune When I came from Asia I was about as tall as this candle stick In fact I used to measure myself by it every day and grease my lips from the lamp to grow a moustache the quicker Still, for fourteen years my master found me personable and my mistress too I say no more, I am not a conceited man Then as the Gods willed, I became the real master of the house and simply had his brains in my pocket'

(§§ 75-6, tr M Hescitine, abridged)

He then describes how he built five ships to export wine to Rome All were wrecked but he built bigger and better and traded in wine, bacon, beans perfumes, and slaves 'Fortunata,' he adds 'did the dutiful thing' by selling all her jewellery and clothes for a hundred gold pieces, which were the leaven of his fortune

'WHAT God wishes soon happens I made a clear ten million on one voyage I at once bought up all the estates which had belonged to my patron I built a house, and bought slaves and cattle, whatever I touched grew like a honey-comb When I came to have more than the whole revenues of my own country, I threw up the game I retired from active work and began to finance freedmen¹ Meanwhile I built this house while Mercury watched over me² As you know it was a tiny place now it is a palace It has four dining rooms twenty bedrooms two marble colonnades, an

¹ i.e. he lent them money securing a clientele and profits Possibly the text should read employ freedmen as lending agents Usury was considered disreputable

² Mercury was the god of business also of gain and good luck

upstairs dining-room, a bedroom where I sleep myself, this viper's boudoir, an excellent room for the porter; there is plenty of spare room for guests. In fact when Scaurus¹ came he preferred staying here to anywhere else, and he has a family place by the sea. There are plenty of other things which I will show you in a minute. Take my word for it; if you have a penny, that is what you are worth; by what a man hath shall he be reckoned.'

(§§ 76-7 with omissions, tr. M. Heseltine.)

In the rest of the book many subjects germane to satire (including some forcible literary criticism) are interwoven with the romance. Thus when the body of Lichas, a sea-captain, is washed ashore, Encolpius, his late enemy, is moved to discourse in the moralizing manner, familiar in the satirists and Seneca, and transmitted unimpaired to Victorian novelists:

'It is not the waves of the sea alone that thus keep faith with mortal men. The warrior's weapons fail him; another pays his vows to heaven, and his own house falls and buries him in the act. Another slips from his coach and dashes out his eager soul: the glutton chokes at dinner, the sparing man dies of want. Make a fair reckoning, and you find ship-wreck everywhere.'

(§ 115, tr. M. Heseltine.)

In the very next section the survivors of the storm enjoy a distant prospect of the city of Croton, and are advised by a farm-bailiff of what they may expect to find there:

'My friends, if you are business men, change your plans, and seek some other means to secure your livelihood. But if you are men of any social pretension, and liars unabashed, you are on the short road to wealth. In this city the learned professions are not esteemed, eloquence has no place, simplicity and righteousness go unhonoured. I would have you know that in this city every man you see belongs to one of two classes—legacy-hunters or the hunted. In this city no one brings up children; for a man with heirs born of his blood has no seat

¹ A man of distinguished family from Rome.

at a dinner party none at the theatre he is excluded from all enjoyments and hides his head among the infamous Those on the other hand who have never married and have no near kin reach the highest dignities in fact they alone are considered soldierly brave or even honest Your way will take you he went on to a town like a plague-stricken country-side where there is nothing but carrion in the rending and the crows who rend (§ 116)

The simile of the body bird is at least as old as Catullus Petronius's method alone is new it is that of Swift in Gulliver's Travels and a great improvement on the mythological scaffolding of Horace¹ who had also classed legacy hunting as a profession

As in Swift so in Petronius it is difficult to disengage the satiric thread from the romantic for it is always permissible to suspect some subtle twist of criticism or parody But with this caution we may turn now to quotations that have a more innocent look

THANKS to Giton we found supper ready and we were making a hearty meal when a timid knock sounded at the door We turned pale and asked who it was Open the door said a voice and you will see While we were speaking the bar slipped and fell of its own accord the door suddenly swung open and let in our visitor It was the veiled woman who had stood with the countryman a little while before Did you think you had deceived me? she said 'I am Quartilla's maid You intruded upon her devotions before her secret chapel Now she has come to your lodgings and begs for the favour of a word with you (§ 16 tr M Heseltine)

In such passages we see Petronius as the ancestor of modern serial fiction and in the next we find him sketching low life with those touches of sordid detail that make the modern realist

EUMOLPUS would not brook an insult he seized a wooden candlestick and followed the lodger out and avenged his bloody forehead with a rain of blows All the household ran up and a crowd of drunken lodgers I had a chance of punishing Eumolpus, and I shut him out, and so got even with the bully. Meanwhile cooks and lodgers belaboured him now that he was locked out, and one thrust a spit full of hissing meat into his eyes, another took a fork from a dresser and struck a fighting attitude. Above all, a blear-eyed old woman with a very dirty linen wrap round her, balancing herself on an uneven pair of clogs, took the lead, brought up a dog of enormous size on a chain, and set him on to Eumolpus. But the candlestick was enough to protect him from all danger. We saw everything through a hole in the folding-doors, which had been made by the handle of the door being broken a short time before; and I was delighted to see him thrashed.

¹ See p. 98 and cf Hor. Ep. 1. 1. 7

(§§ 95-6. tr. M. Heseltine.)

But it would be a mistake to minimize the distance that separates the age of Nero from that of the railway bookstall. The absence of plot and the debased tone make a wide difference; so too the verse insets, which must not be forgotten.

The longest of these are put into the mouth of Eumolpus, an incontinent old poet who attached himself to the hero in a picture-gallery. A painting of the Sack of Troy occasions 65 iambic lines, followed by a hasty retreat from marks of public scorn; and later, on the road to Croton, 205 hexameters show how an epic of the civil war should be written. The iambics are said to be a parody of Nero's poem on the same subject: the others (which are tinged with satire) a parody of Lucan, though more probably they convey the ideas of Petronius himself. Of the remainder some are quotations, mock-heroics, or satires in miniature; and some carry a prose speech to its climax, or wing the utterances of passion. Most striking of all are the short descriptive pieces that lift the narrative to a jubilant strain beyond the compass of prose—the 'diversions on a penny whistle'. They have a peculiar charm, matched only in some other poems of Petronius that have accidentally survived; and yet reminiscent, very often, of the scenic settings found in Ovid. Here we approach a lover's trysting-place:

'Love houses here!' sing nightingale and swallow,
Philomel from wild wood, Procne from the eaves—
 Couched on the green sward soft among the violets
 Sing of pleasure stolen, lusty little thieves!

She lay there, thrown idly down her marble neck against a bed of gold, and was fanning her peaceful face with a spray of myrtle in flower (§ 131)

Marble and 'peaceful' are statuesque epithets and assort well with the details of a fuller likeness chiselled out just before

WHATEVER I write must fall short of her. Her hair grew in natural waves and flowed all over her shoulders, her forehead was small and her hair at the roots turned back from it. her brows ran to the edge of her cheekbones and almost met again close beside her eyes and those eyes were brighter than stars far from the moon and her nose had a little curve and her mouth was the kind Praxiteles dreamed Diana had. And her chin and her neck, and her hands and the gleam of her foot under a light band of gold! She had turned the marble of Paros dull. So then at last I put my old passion for Doris to despite (§ 126 tr M Heseltine)

Ovid would probably have painted in the colour of her hair and cheeks

Nearly a century divides Petronius from the greatest of the romancers. LUCIUS APULEIUS born about A.D. 125 at Madaura in Algeria. Besides his romance he has left us a speech made in his own defence on a charge of sorcery, some philosophical treatises,¹ and also the Florida an anthology from speeches made on various occasions in which we see him as the professional rhetorician travelling the eastern Mediterranean and giving 'concerts in language'. One of these choice pieces—an oration of thanks to the senate of Carthage for decreeing a statue in his honour—provides a good example of the short story as cultivated in Rhetoric. An accident had interrupted the public appearances of plot describes the adventures of Lucius, whom we find travelling in Thessaly—the most bewitched of all lands under the moon; for ‘all the more genuine appliances of the black art, once practised there by Medea, were still in use’. This is plainly shown by the tale of a travelling companion who beguiled the way to Hypata, leaving Lucius politely credulous of magic and curious to learn more. Here Lucius gives his first impressions of the city:

See p. 48. An imaginative portrait of Apuleius's personality will be found in W. Pater's Marius the Epicurean ch. xx.

IN the city of Hypata nothing seemed to be its true self. You might think that through the murmuring of some cadaverous spell all things had been changed into forms not their own; that there was humanity in the hardness of the stones you stumbled on; that the birds you heard singing were feathered men; that the trees around the walls drew their leaves from a like source. The statues seemed about to move, the walls to speak, the dumb cattle to break out in prophecy; nay! the very sky and the sunbeams, as if they might suddenly cry out.’

(ii. 1, tr. W. Pater.)

In this city Lucius stays with the skin-flint Milo and his wife Pamphile, but dines on occasion at the house of a rich kinswoman Byrrhaena. There his curiosity is whetted by the tale of Thelyphron, a Milesian, who relates the adventure which cost him his ears and nose:

IFORTUNED in an evil hour to come to the city Larissa, where, while I went up and down to view the streets, to take some relief for my poor estate (for I had spent near all my money), I espied a tall old man standing upon a stone in the midst of the market-place, crying with a loud voice, and saying that if any man would watch a dead corpse that night he should be rewarded and a price be fixed for his pains. Which when I heard faces of dead men and thereby work their sorceries and enchantments 'Then quoth I in good fellowship tell me the order of this custody of the dead and how it is? Marry quoth he 'first you must watch all the night with your eyes staring and bent continually upon the corpse without winking never looking off nor even moving aside for these witches do change their skin and turn themselves at will into sundry kinds of beasts whereby they deceive the eyes even of the sun and of very Justice sometimes they are transformed into birds sometimes into dogs and mice and sometimes into flies moreover they will charm the keepers of the corpse asleep neither can it be declared what means and shifts these wicked women do use to bring their purpose to pass and the reward for such dangerous watching is no more than four or six pieties of gold But hearken further which I had well nigh forgotten if the keeper of the dead do not render on the morning following the corpse whole and sound as he received the same he shall be punished in this sort That is if the corpse be diminished or spoiled in any part the same shall be diminished and spoiled in the face of the keeper to patch it up withal

(ii 21-2 tr Adlington¹)

Thelyphron undertook the night watching and when the widow with seven witnesses had made careful inventory of the features of her dead was left to his task with an oil lamp for comfort

NOW when I was alone to keep the corpse company I rubbed mine eyes to arm them for watching and to the intent that I would not sleep I solaced my mind with singing and so I passed the time till it was dark and then night deeper and deeper still and then midnight when behold as I grew already more afraid there crept in a weasel into the chamber and she came against me and fixed a sharp look upon me and put me in a very great fear in so much that I marvelled greatly of

¹ Revised by S Gaseler Loeb Edn (London W Heinemann 1915)
Adlington's translation (566) perhaps gives the best idea of the style of the original

the audacity of so little a beast. To whom I said: 'Get thee hence, thou filthy brute, and hie thee to the mice thy fellows, lest thou feel my fingers. Why wilt thou not go?' Then incontinently she ran away, and when she was quite gone from the chamber I fell on the ground so fast in the deepest depth of sleep that Apollo himself could not well discern whether of us two was the dead corpse, for I lay prostrate as one without life, and needed a keeper likewise, and had as well not been there.

At length the cocks began to crow declaring night past and that it was now day, wherewithal I waked, and, being greatly afraid, ran unto the dead body with the lamp in my hand, and I uncovered his face and viewed him closely round about; all the parts were there: and immediately came in the wretched matron all blubbered with her witnesses, and threw herself upon the corpse, and, eftsoons kissing him, examined his body in the lamplight, and found no part diminished. Then she turned and commanded one Philodespotus, her steward, to pay the good guardian his wages forthwith, which when he had done, he said: 'We thank you, gentle young man, for your pains, and verily for your diligence herein we will account you as one of the family.'

Whereupon I, being joyous of my un hoped gain, and rattling my money in my hand, as I gazed upon its shining colour, did answer: 'Nay, madam, I pray you, esteem me as one of your servitors; and as often as you need my services at any time I am at your commandment.'

(ii. 25-6, tr. Adlington.)

These ill-omened words caused him some rough-handling by the servants, but worse was to follow. At the funeral an uncle of the dead man accused the widow of murder, and prevailed upon Zatchlas, an Egyptian priest, to recall the corpse to momentary life for the sake of his testimony. The miracle is performed: but the revived man seeks only rest. At last he is threatened by Zatchlas with the tortures of Hell, and then declares that his wife had poisoned him to make room for a lover. There follows a denial by the woman—and now Thelyphron continues:

THE people were in a turmoil and divided in sundry ways some thought best the vile woman should be burned alive with her husband but some said there ought no credit to be given unto the dead body that spake falsely which opinion was clean taken away by the words which the corpse spoke again with deeper groaning and said Behold I will give you an evident token which never yet any other man knew whereby you shall perceive that I declare the truth and by and by he pointed towards me that stood on the stone and said When thus the good guardian of my body watched me diligently in the night and the wicked witches and enchantresses came into the chamber to spoil me of my limbs and to bring such their purpose to pass did transform themselves into the shape of beasts and when they could in no wise deceive or beguile his vigilant eyes they cast him at last into so dead and sound a sleep that by their witchcraft he seemed without spirit or life After this they called me by my name and did never cease till the cold members of my body began by little and little to revive to obey their magic arts then he being lively indeed howbeit buried in sleep because he and I were named by one name rose up when they called and walked as one without sense like some lifeless ghost and they though the door was fast closed came in by a certain hole and cut off first his nose and then his ears and so that butchery was done to him which was appointed to be done to me And that such their subtlety might not be perceived they made him very exactly a like pair of ears of wax and fitted it exactly upon him and a nose like his they made also wherefore you may see that the poor wretch for his diligence hath received no reward of money but loss of his members

Which when he had said I was greatly astonished and (minding to feel my face) put my hand to my nose and my nose fell off and put my hand to my ears and my ears fell off Whereat all the people pointed and nodded at me and laughed me to scorn but I (being stricken in a cold sweat) crept between their legs for shame and escaped away (n 29-31 tr Adlington)

Touches of humour enliven the narrative; and there is more than a hint of satire on the belief in witchcraft prevalent at the time—for Apuleius knew his magic from within. Before long Lucius, by misapplying the secret arts of Pamphile (herself a witch), becomes not like her, an owl, but the very sum and substance of an ass; and so gives the book its name. He needs only a mouthful of roses to restore his proper shape, but by a series of mischances the restoration is deferred. Meanwhile robbers sack the house of Milo; and Lucius, burdened with the miser's gold, is cudgelled to their mountain fastness. There three stories of brigandage are recounted, and presently a maiden, seized on her wedding-day, is added to the spoils. It is for her comfort that a drunken old crone tells the Milesian tale of 'Cupid and Psyche', (iv. 28-vi. 24) unique not only in its charm but in another way as well; for in spite of its colouring as an erotic romance, from the opening sentence 'Once upon a time there lived a king and queen . . .' to the happy reunion of the lovers at the end, it remains a true fairy-tale, and as such has no parallel in classical literature.

The worship of Venus had been injured by the loveliness of the young princess Psyche, whom Cupid was ordered to afflict with some unworthy passion. She lived admired but unloved; and soon her parents were ordered by Apollo's oracle to expose her on a high hill, for marriage to 'that serpent thing by reason of whom even the gods tremble and the shadows of Styx are afraid'. She was in great fear; but found herself transported to a fairy palace, and there lived in rich content with a bridegroom who came and went in darkness. Then two sisters, grown jealous, persuaded her that the husband she had never seen was a monster, not a man. She must conceal a lamp and a knife at the bedside, and strike off its head while it slept. Psyche takes their advice:

WITH lamp plucked forth, knife in hand, she put by her sex; and lo! as the secrets of the bed became manifest, the sweetest and most gentle of all creatures. Love himself, reclined there, in his own proper loveliness. At sight of him the very flame of the lamp kindled more gladly! But Psyche was afraid at the vision, and, faint of soul, trembled back upon her knees, and would have hidden the steel in her own bosom. But the knife slipped from her hand; and now, undone, yet oftentimes looking upon the beauty of that divine countenance, she lives again She sees the locks of that golden head pleasant with the unction of the gods shed down in graceful entanglement behind and before about the ruddy cheeks and white throat The pinions of the winged god yet fresh with the dew are spotless upon his shoulders the delicate plumage wavering over them as they lie at rest Smooth he was and touched with light worthy of Venus his mother At the foot of the couch lay his bow and arrows, the instruments of his power propitious to men

And Psyche gazing hungrily thereon draws an arrow from the quiver and trying the point upon her thumb tremulous still drave in the barb so that a drop of blood came forth Thus fell she by her own act and unaware into the love of Love Falling upon the bridegroom with indrawn breath in a hurry of kisses from eager and open lips she shuddered as she thought how brief that sleep might be And it chanced that a drop of burning oil fell from the lamp upon the god's shoulder Ah! maladroit minister of love thus to wound him from whom all fire comes though 'twas a lover I trow first devised thee to have the fruit of his desire even in the darkness! At the touch of the fire the god started up and beholding the overthrow of her faith quietly took flight from her embraces

And Psyche as he rose upon the wing laid hold on him with her two hands hanging upon him in his passage through the air till she sinks to the earth through weariness And as she lay there the divine lover tarrying still lighted upon a cypress tree which grew near and from the top of it spake thus to her in great emotion Foolish one! unmindful of the command of Venus my mother who had devoted thee to one of base degree I fled to thee in his stead Now know I that this was vainly done Into mine own flesh pierced mine arrow and I made thee my wife only that I might seem a monster beside thee—that thou shouldst seek to wound the head wherem lay the eyes so full of love to thee! Again and again I thought to put thee on thy guard concerning these things and warned thee in loving kindness

Now I would but punish thee by my flight hence.' And there-with he winged his way into the deep sky.

Psyche, prostrate upon the earth, and following far as sight might reach the flight of the bridegroom, wept and lamented ; and, when the breadth of space had parted him wholly from her, cast herself down from the bank of a river which was nigh. But the stream, turning gentle in honour of the god, put her forth again unhurt upon its margin. And as it happened, Pan, the rustic god, was sitting just then by the waterside, embracing, in the body of a reed, the goddess Canna ; teaching her to respond to him in all varieties of slender sound. Hard by, his flock of goats browsed at will. And the shaggy god called her, wounded and outworn, kindly to him and said, ' I am but a rustic herdsman, pretty maiden, yet wise, by favour of my great age and long experience ; and if I guess truly by those faltering steps, by thy sorrowful eyes and continual sighing, thou labourest with excess of love. Listen then to me, and seek not death again, in the stream or otherwise. Put aside thy woe, and turn thy prayers to Cupid. He is in truth a delicate youth : win him by the delicacy of thy service.'

(v. 22-5, tr. W. Pater.)

The rest of the story—of perilous tasks set by Venus, and kindly beasts who helped Psyche to perform them—may be read in the same translation,¹ or in the verses of William Morris and Robert Bridges. We must return now to Lucius the Ass, whom we find, after many adventures, sold to a miller and turning the mill. Apuleius gives us here one of those stark descriptions of the world as it was that have both an interest of their own and serve also to make his unrealities almost credible. Lucius is speaking :

O GOOD Lord, what a sort of poor slaves were there ; some had their skin bruised all over black and blue, some had their backs striped with lashes and were but covered rather than clothed with torn rags, some had their members only hidden by a narrow cloth all wore such ragged clouts that you might perceive through them all their naked bodies, some were marked and burned in their forehead with hot irons, some had their hair half clipped, some had shackles on their legs, ugly and evil favoured some could scarce see, their eyes and faces were so black and dim with smoke their eyelids all cankered with the darkness of that reeking place half blind and sprinkled black and white with dirty flour like boxers which fight together befouled with sand But how should I speak of the horses my companions, how they, being old mules or weak horses thrust their heads into the manger and ate the heaps of straws? They had their necks all wounded and worn away with old sores they rattled their nostrils with a continual cough, their sides were bare with continual rubbing of their harness and great travail, their ribs were broken and the bones did show with perpetual beating their hoofs were battered very broad with endless walking, and their whole skin ragged by reason of mange and their great age When I saw this dreadful sight I saw no comfort or consolation of my torments saving that my mind and my in-born curiosity was somewhat recreated to hear and understand what every man said and did, for they neither feared nor doubted my presence

¹ Marius the Epicurean, ch. v. Adlington's version will be found in the Loeb edn., or edited (together with some other tales from Apuleius) by W. H. D. Rouse in the King's Classics Series (A. Moring, Ltd., London, 1904).

(ix 12-13, tr. Adlington)

There are many other scenes which give a vivid impression of contemporary life—but mainly of low life, as befits the station of an ass and most of the tales that Lucius overhears reflect the morbid sensationalism of common folk We seem to move through the tinsel and tinklings and raffish humanity of an old world fair, with a guide who leaves no side show or chamber of horrors unexplored It is true that 'Cupid and Psyche' does much to relieve the narrative and shorter tales of the merrier Milesian kind found no less favour in Thessaly, where laughter was honoured as a god¹ But in spite of these interludes and a constant humour of situation the annals of crime become more and more wearisome and crowd closer than ever in Books ix and x

The last book is a welcome change The human appetites

¹ cf. 31-32 12

Now I would but punish thee by my flight hence.' And there-with he winged his way into the deep sky.

Psyche, prostrate upon the earth, and following far as sight might reach the flight of the bridegroom, wept and lamented ; and, when the breadth of space had parted him wholly from her, cast herself down from the bank of a river which was nigh. But the stream, turning gentle in honour of the god, put her forth again unhurt upon its margin. And as it happened, Pan, the rustic god, was sitting just then by the waterside, embracing, in the body of a reed, the goddess Canna ; teaching her to respond to him in all varieties of slender sound. Hard by, his flock of goats browsed at will. And the shaggy god called her, wounded and outworn, kindly to him and said, ' I am but a rustic herdsman, pretty maiden, yet wise, by favour of my great age and long experience ; and if I guess truly by those faltering steps, by thy sorrowful eyes and continual sighing, thou labourest with excess of love. Listen then to me, and seek not death again, in the stream or otherwise. Put aside thy woe, and turn thy prayers to Cupid. He is in truth a delicate youth : win him by the delicacy of thy service.'

(v. 22-5, tr. W. Pater.)

The rest of the story—of perilous tasks set by Venus, and kindly beasts who helped Psyche to perform them—may be read in the same translation,¹ or in the verses of William Morris and Robert Bridges. We must return now to Lucius the Ass, whom we find, after many adventures, sold to a miller and turning the mill. Apuleius gives us here one of those stark descriptions of the world as it was that have both an interest of their own and serve also to make his unrealities almost credible. Lucius is speaking :

O GOOD Lord, what a sort of poor slaves were there ; some had their skin bruised all over black and blue, some had their backs striped with lashes and were but covered rather than clothed with torn rags, some had their members only hidden by a narrow cloth, all wore such ragged clouts that you might perceive through them all their naked bodies some were marked and burned in their forehead with hot irons some had their hair half clipped, some had shackles on their legs ugly and evil favoured, some could scarce see their eyes and faces were so black and dim with smoke their eyelids all cankered with the darkness of that reeking place half blind and sprinkled black and white with dirty flour like boxers which fight together besouled with sand But how should I speak of the horses my companions how they, being old mules or weak horses, thrust their heads into the manger and ate the heaps of straws? They had their necks all wounded and worn away with old sores, they rattled their nostrils with a continual cough, their sides were bare with continual rubbing of their harness and great travail their ribs were broken and the bones did show with perpetual beating their hoofs were battered very broad with endless walking and their whole skin ragged by reason of mange and their great age When I saw this dreadful sight I saw no comfort or consolation of my torments saving that my mind and my inborn curiosity was somewhat recreated to hear and understand what every man said and did for they neither feared nor doubted my presence

¹ Marius the Epicurean, ch. v. Adlington's version will be found in the Loeb edn., or edited (together with some other tales from Apuleius) by W. H. D. Rouse in the King's Classics Series (A. Moring, Ltd., London, 1904).

(ix 12-13 tr Adlington)

There are many other scenes which give a vivid impression of contemporary life—but mainly of low life, as befits the station of an ass, and most of the tales that Lucius overhears reflect the morbid sensationalism of common folk. We seem to move through the tinsel and tinklings and raffish humanity of an old world fair, with a guide who leaves no side show or chamber of horrors unexplored. It is true that 'Cupid and Psyche' does much to relieve the narrative and shorter tales of the merrier Milesian kind found no less favour in Thessaly where laughter was honoured as a god.¹ But in spite of these interludes and a constant humour of situation the annals of crime become more and more wearisome and crowd closer than ever in Books ix and x.

The last book is a welcome change. The human appetites

¹ ib. 31-III. 12

SATIRE

As if to assert its independence Satire in contrast with other genres bears not a Greek but a Latin name. It owes something as we shall see, to Greece but may rightly be called the most original creation of the Roman mind. It was also the most characteristic for it allowed free play to the livelier side of the national genius and yet as a criticism of real life had a ballast of hard utility. With modern satire its connexion is partly accidental. Satura meant in its origin nothing more than a medley or miscellany as various in subject matter as in form and tone. No doubt it was always flavoured with 'sharp Italian wit', but even that was not required by the title.

The first writer of literary ¹ saturae was Quintus Ennius (239-169 B.C.). Little remains of his four books but we know that he used a variety of metres including the hexameter and can trace in his work many elements reproduced by his successors. Among these are a dialogue, a fable and some gastronomic precepts all drawn from Hellenistic sources also anecdote moral maxims character sketch and Greek natural philosophy in a popular setting. There are too a few personal touches e.g. 'I never write poetry unless I have the gout' which foreshadow the candid reflexions of Lucilius and Horace. He wrote without acrimony for his position was not independent, and he lived in a complacent age. The satires of his nephew the tragedian Marcus Valerius (220-132 B.C.) were probably of the same innocent kind.

The next of the satirists is GAIUS LUCILIUS (180-102 B.C.). Nearly two centuries after his death readers were still to be found who placed him at the head of all Latin poets and others who at least preferred him in satire to Horace. He was the first to take the public into his confidence the first outspoken critic of men and manners, and above all he was essentially a national poet who wrote for his countrymen at large and struck just those notes whether of ridicule or gravity, to which they alone could properly respond. Probably, too he was thought of as the inventor of something new to the literature.

¹ There is some reason—perhaps insufficient—for believing that the earliest saturae were of a rude dramatic character resembling if not identical with the Fescennine verses in which Italians of old days exchanged r. bawdry and repartee.

² See pp. 1 & 11.

³ See pp. 18 ff. 17-174 ff.

⁴ See p. 155.

of the world. He owed something in the way of inspiration and suggestion to the Old Attic Comedy (c. 460-404), and more to those Hellenistic writers who provided Roman satirists from Ennius onwards with stock themes and characters and not a little of their ethical teaching.¹ But his personal strictures are not easily matched; and in making a prevalent use of the hexameter he was also the author of a metrical convention. Roman satire can claim that there is nothing in Greek which embraces the same variety of subject and mood in the same singleness of form.

The numerous fragments of his thirty books are a poor index of his genius: his best monument is the work of the later satirists and the homage they pay. In their pages reappear his attacks on those social and moral vices which represent (in Sellar's words) 'the two extremes to which the Roman temperament was most prone, rapacity and meanness in gaining money, vulgar ostentation and coarse sensuality in using it'. Possibly a few quotations, even in translation, may give some slight idea of his style. We have, for example, these four lines on a miser:

HACK, serving-man, companion, he has none;
His money-bag and coin he bears alone;
Dines with the bag, sleeps, bathes: to shoulder tied Carries the bag,—and all his soul inside!

(Ed. F. Marx, 243-6.)

The repetition of the word 'bulga' (bag) is a typical Lucilian device, crude but vigorous. Another fragment records a rebuke addressed to a glutton:

PUBLIUS Sink-pit Gallonius, my poor friend!
You've never known good fare (says he,) who spend
On shell-fish and a sturgeon overgrown,
That make your supper, every cent you own!

(Ibid., 1238-40.)

Laelius, a man of simple life, and boon companion of Scipio Aemilianus, may well have been the speaker. Lucilius was familiar with both. He became a warm partisan, and made those violent attacks on Scipio's opponents to which Persius has borne witness.

¹ Specific debts to particular Greek authors of the late fourth and the third century B.C. can sometimes be named, but such authors are rarely extant. In a more general way the character-sketch, the New-Comedy (c. 336-250 B.C.), and the mime all contributed something to the making of Roman satire; and much of its ethical teaching was derived from the 'diatribes' or popular discourses of strolling philosophers. These were often imaginary dialogues; and had counterparts in verse.

When vice appeared,
Lucilius o'er the town his falchion reared,
On Læpæ, Mucius poured his rage by name
And broke his grinders on their bleeding fame

(Persius, l. 114 15 tr Gifford.)

But politics expanded into a larger patriotism. He scourged incapacity and corruption in high places with impartial zeal, and did not spare 'the mass of the people in their tribes.' There is a longish fragment on Virtue, which becomes more tolerable if we remember that it was written at the time when Rome in gaining the world was losing her soul. It recalls some chapters of a book¹ dealing partly with British administration in India and written round the text 'to be sure the object we aim at is good, and to weigh carefully the effectiveness and expense of the means.' Virtue, to Lucilius is the perfect possession of this science, the fruit not only of practical wisdom but sound character. An attempt has been made to preserve the repetitions of the original and its alliterative effects notably the hammer strokes of the last two lines.

VIRTUE, Albius, is a power of Mind,
The several works and ways of human kind
Virtue appraises with a judgement mee
To weigh the worth of things and proper price
Virtue knows good and evil true and base,
Profit unprofit good report disgrace,
Virtue defines true pain and draws its bound
Virtue rates riches at their price per pound,
Virtue by worth not titles metes reward
Fights evil men and ways at home abroad;
Right living men contrainwise defends
Exalts them furthurs werts with them as friends,
Bids us put first the profit of the Town
Our parents profit next and last our own

(1126-35).

¹ Early Empire and Eastward by J. Fitzjames Stephen (Thacker & Co.) 1873. Cf pp. 49, 64, 75.

In another place he deplores the growing taste for forensic oratory, reminding us of Cato, who had proposed paving the Forum with sharp stones for the discomfort of litigants:

ON work-day and on holiday, at early day and late,
The common folk foregather and the Fathers of the State;

They bustle in the Forum, they never quit or part;
Day-long one passion holds them, they follow but one art,—
To cheat with circumspection, to fight a crooked fight,
To play the honest patriot, and be the most polite;
To set their words in ambush, and let the world suppose
That Roman fellow-citizens no fellows are, but foes!

(1228-34.)

The force and sincerity of Lucilius may be admitted; but the expression is diffuse and the technique rude. He had found Ennius 'cumbrous and grotesque'; but it is on the formal side that he himself is most exposed to criticism. 'What', says Horace, 'could be expected of a man who, with the utmost complacency, would pour forth 200 verses an hour, standing all the time on one leg? He is discursive, garrulous, too lazy to revise, a turbid torrent of fair waters mixed with foul.' Perhaps this fragment will illustrate Horace's remarks. Lucilius is addressing a friend who has failed to call and inquire after his health:

I'LL tell you how I am, though all unasked,—
Nor do you mean to ask; but modern still
And modish, keep away, and wish the death
Of friends you would not visit when you should!
That jingle, 'would' and 'should', you may mislike,
As 'cliquant d'Isocrate',¹ 'propos volage',
And 'pur enfantillage',—what if you do?
I shall not scratch my head again for you.

(181-8.)

The French must do duty for Greek, which Lucilius often uses,² though he is quick to satirize the affectation of Greek habits of life

¹ Isocrates (436-338 B.C.) was a Greek orator who affected a highly artificial style.

² Many Greek words had a popular currency, as they supplied defects in the technical vocabulary of Latin.

and thought Philosophic quibbling and superstition are among the other follies of intellect which he exposes, and he varies his fare with literary criticism ridiculing for example the tragic compounds of Pacuvius by describing one of his heroines as

Tortured with hunger cold unwashedness
Unbathedness undouchedness unemptness

(599-600)

or experimenting with compounds whether by way of parody or not as in another characteristic fragment

No wife for me to fob me of my wealth '
A silver plate- { mantilla { prodigal
An ivory mounted hand glass { prodigal '

(682 3)

He also found room for questions of grammar orthography and metre anecdote and narrative and even a whole book devoted to his mistress Collyra The modern press is the nearest counterpart to satura if we can imagine some journal of the Town reflecting a single personality as frank in self revelation as any diarist

After Lucilius satire bifurcates The antiquarian MARCUS TERENTIUS VARRO of Reate (116-27 B.C.) went back for his model to the cynic dialogues of Menippus² of Gadara who had trifled suggestively with problems of social life and philosophy in a manner known to us only through his imitator Lucian (c. A.D. 125-190) Varro is said to have composed 150 books of Menippean Satires but only the subject titles and some short fragments survive A distinguishing mark of this type of satire is the use of both prose and verse Seneca's *Apocolocyntosis*³ and the *Satyricon*⁴ of Petronius are off-shoots from the same branch

Personal confidences do not seem to have been common in Varro's work and he does not preach at or abuse At the most he shows a general moral antagonism to the new order of things both in literature and society, tempered by the mellow and genial wisdom of a scholar whose heart was in the country and seems to have drawn from it a faith buoyant enough to outlive the political conflicts of his time These few scraps reflecting a happier past have still some warmth of colour about

¹ See pp. 157 306 ff

² See p. 90

³ Early third century A.C.

⁴ See p. 57 ff

them, and the last is touched with humour: 'So in the old days religion was held sacred and everything was holy.' 'The wife would spin her wool and keep her eye on the porridge-pot to see it didn't burn.' 'The visitor had the pantry, the locks and keys, the meat-racks, the wine-casks, at his disposal, . . . had the food in front of him, and sat well-fed at another's cost, without a thought for what's gone or what's to come, but with just one eye turned towards the kitchen door.'¹

A late essayist has fortunately preserved a less broken series of quotations, gently didactic in character, and combining a certain liveliness of expression with an academic precision of manner. They also reveal something of the charm of Varro's personality, and of his qualities as a host (which are amply attested by Cicero):

THERE is a witty paper of Varro's, to be found among his 'Satires of Menippus', and entitled 'Know'st not the Joys that Vesper brings?' wherein he discourses on the dinner-party and its arrangements, and especially on the number to form an ideal party. This, he says, should begin with the Graces, and go as far as the Muses—that is, start at three and end with nine—so as to be at the smallest never smaller than three, at the most never more than nine. For that there be many, he says, is not convenient, seeing that you may not have a crowd without noise and crowding, and they nowhere recline, but either stand as at Rome, or sit as at Athens. Furthermore, he goes on, four points are necessary to make your dinner perfect and complete: good fellows to meet, good place and season to meet in, and a good table. Again, in the choosing of the guests, we should look for those who will neither chatter nor be mum, for eloquence befits the forum and the senate; silence suits the bed-chamber, rather than the hall. Accordingly, he lays it down that the conversation on such occasions should deal, not with burning or intricate questions, but with pleasant and attractive topics, where utility should be blended with charm and pleasantness, so as to draw out the agreeable and amiable side of us.

¹ Merry, pp. 205, 209, 210, tr. R. J. E. Tiddy, 'Saturnalia and Satire', in English Literature and the Classics (Oxford, 1912), p. 208.

And this, says he, will come about if we converse on the subjects of every-day life, for the discussion of which we have no time in the press of business. Moreover, in the master of the feast, not elegance is required, but rather absence of meanness, and the readings should be not indiscriminate but such as tend to the instruction and amusement of the hearers. He also prescribes what the dessert should be, using these words 'those delicacies will be most sugared wherein is least sugar for dainties are but treasonable allies to a dainty digestion

(From Aulus Gellius, Noctes Atticæ, viii. 11. tr. H. C. F. Mason.)

In 'The Sixty year old' Varro plays the part of a Roman Rip van Winkle, waking after a sleep of half a century to the Rome of Catiline, and he may have employed that other common device of satirists by which the reader is transported to some Cloudeuckootown or Brobdingnag and shown from there the imperfections of his own world. 'Marcopolis' gives his idea of a good State, and in the 'Marcipor' perhaps a dialogue between slave and master, some iambic lines are suggestive of a winged flight to another sphere.

T WAS close about the night's noon-day,
 And now the Air, in rich array
 Shot far and wide with glowing fires,
 Displayed the dance of astral quires,—
 When freezing rain-clouds lightly driven,
 Obscured the golden vault of Heaven!
 Downforth on mortal souls they spout,
 From frozen Pole the winds brake out,
 Sons of the North in frenzied play
 Tiles, branches brooms, they tear away,
 And we, in wreckage fallen like storks
 Whose balanced plumes the lightning-forks
 In flame have blasted,—we from high Ruined to earth most miserably

(269-272.)

It is hard to represent the diction, which is a strange mixture of words common and poetic, old and new, and Greek roots latinized. Though Varro can parody the erotic poetasters of his day, his own technique was behind the times. In prose he reveals the Roman gift for epigram that was to have free play in Silver Latin—e.g. 'A fault in a wife must either be cured or endured; who cures it makes for himself a better wife; who endures it makes of himself a better man.'¹ But the author of 620 books on seventy-four different subjects was not a finished writer. Part of his object was to overcome the national distaste for speculative thought by presenting it in a humorous and popular form; yet his allusiveness and bilingual habits cannot have appealed to a wide public.

The Satires of QUINTUS HORATIUS FLACCUS (65–8 B.C.²) are among the earliest of his works, but give us of his best. He was a critical disciple of Lucilius, to whom he is largely indebted for subject-matter, situations, and characters.³ His earlier pieces show an aggressive spirit and an occasional coarseness and archaism that are also suggestive of his master; but these disappear as his art develops. Personalities become fewer, and his ridicule is often levelled at himself—though of course the shot scatters. He corrects the discursiveness of Lucilius by the treatment in each piece of a set theme; and his other advances in the arrangement and expression of thought are so marked that Roman satire as a work of literary finish may almost be claimed as his creation. To write poetry was not his object. He expressly denies satura that title, and accommodates his diction and metre—the hexameter—to a conversational style;⁴ yet the result is a model of concealed art that was never successfully reproduced. Perhaps his manner is best characterized by Persius:

Sly Horace, while he strove to mend,
Probed all the foibles of his smiling friend;

¹ From 'A Husband's Duties,' Fr. 83.

² See pp. 69 ff., 166, 338 ff., 364 ff.

³ e.g. 'Gallionius'; see above, p. 282. How far he referred to living persons by name is not clear: in any case he succeeds in making his characters live.

⁴ His satires are twice referred to under the name Satura: elsewhere they are called 'sermones'—conversations. He implies a debt to the Hellenistic writer Bion of Borysthenes (c. 250 B.C.) who combined an informal style with a broad and caustic wit.

Played lightly round and round the peccant part
And won unfelt an entrance to his heart

(Sat 1 116-17 tr Gifford.)

A largeness of temper and complete freedom from cant¹ have won for the Satires an influence denied very often to works of finer spiritual appeal

It is doubtful if Horace's position and times allowed the same freedom of speech that Lucilius enjoyed but in any case his method was different and its effects are a tribute to his own practice of his constant precept—the avoidance of extremes. He differs also in choosing folly and bad taste as his proper quarry and in addressing himself not to a wide public but to a courtly and cultivated set. It is in self-revelation and a certain independence of character that the two are most alike.

To some readers he was less obviously the disciple of Lucilius than the critic and so in the tenth satire of Book 1 he justifies himself pointing out that though Lucilius chose the right models he had not learnt from them all he might

YES I did say that view him as a bard
Lucilius is unrhythmic rugged hard
Lives there a partisan so weak of brain
As to join issue on a fact so plain?
But that he had a gift of biting wit
In the same page I hastened to admit.
Now understand me that's a point confessed
But he who grants it grants not all the rest
For were a bard a bard because he's smart
Laberius² mimes were products of high art
Tis not enough to make your reader's face
Wear a broad grin though that too has its place
Terseness there wants to make the thought ring clear
Nor with a crowd of words confuse the ear
There wants a plastic style now grave now light
Now such as bard or orator would write

¹ Cf H. W. Carrad The Oxford Book of Latin Verse (Clarendon Press 1912) p. vi

² A Roman knight who in 45 B.C. was compelled by Julius Caesar to act in his own mimes on the stage (see p. 169)

And now the language of a well-bred man,
 Who masks his strength, and says not all he can :
 And pleasantry will often cut clean through
 Hard knots that gravity would scarce undo.
 On this the old comedians rested : hence
 They're still the models of all men of sense.

(i. 10. 1-17, tr. Conington.)

Next, a passage from the most famous of the narrative satires, describing an encounter with a bore :

A LONG the Sacred Road I strolled one day,
 Deep in some bagatelle (you know my way),
 When up comes one whose name I scarcely knew—
 ' The dearest of dear fellows ! how d'ye do ? '
 He grasped my hand—' Well, thanks : the same to you.'
 Then, as he still kept walking by my side,
 To cut things short, ' You've no commands ? ' I cried.
 ' Nay, you should know me : I'm a man of lore.'
 ' Sir, I'm your humble servant all the more.'
 All in a fret to make him let me go,
 I now walk fast, now loiter and walk slow,
 Now whisper to my servant, while the sweat
 Ran down so fast, my very feet were wet.
 ' O had I but a temper worth the name,
 Like yours, Bolanus ! ' ¹ inly I exclaim,
 While he keeps running on at a hand-trot,
 About the town, the streets, I know not what.
 Finding I made no answer, ' Ah ! I see,
 You're at a strait to rid yourself of me ;
 But 'tis no use : I'm a tenacious friend,
 And mean to hold you till your journey's end.'
 ' No need to take you such a round : I go
 To visit an acquaintance you don't know :
 Poor man ! he's ailing at his lodging, far Beyond the bridge, where Caesar's gardens are.'

¹ A choleric man, who would have given the bore short shrift.

' O, never mind I've nothing else to do,
And want a walk, so I'll step on with you '

Down go my ears in donkey-fashion, straight,
You've seen them do it, when their load's too great

' If I mistake not,' he begins ' you'll find
Viscus not more, nor Varius,¹ to your mind
There's not a man can turn a verse so soon,
Or dance so nimbly when he hears a tune
While, as for singing—ah! my forte is there
Tigellius'² self might envy me, I'll swear

He paused for breath I falteringly strike in
' Have you a mother? have you kith or kin
To whom your life is precious? ' ' Not a soul
My line's extinct I have interred the whole '
O happy they! (so into thought I fell)
After life's endless babble they sleep well

(l. 9 1-28, tr Conington)

The bore had preferred Horace's company to answering a summons in court and was finally removed by the plaintiff. He had tried to obtain from Horace an introduction to Maecenas, observing

' He picks his friends with care, a shrewd, wise man '

This takes us back to an earlier satire in which Horace defends both himself and his patron against those who resented their intimacy. At first sight the defence looks self-complacent. But after all merit is the only true ground for patronage—and Horace is not afraid to say so. He then disarms an obvious criticism by attributing to his father's care any merit he possesses.

I F I have lived unstained and unproved
(Forgive self-praise) if loving and beloved,
I owe it to my father who though poor
Passed by the village school at his own door,

¹ The two sons of Vibius Viscus a Roman knight were among Horace's literary friends so too Lucius Varius who edited the Aeneid after Virgil's death.

² Hermogenes Tigellius was a musician whose taste frequently excites Horace's ridicule.

The school where great tall urchins in a row,
Sons of great tall centurions, used to go,
With slate and satchel on their backs, to pay
Their monthly quota punctual to the day,
And took his boy to Rome, to learn the arts
Which knight or senator to his imparts.
Whoe'er had seen me, neat and more than neat,
With slaves behind me, in the crowded street,
Had surely thought a fortune fair and large,
Two generations old, sustained the charge.
Himself the true tried guardian of his son,
Whene'er I went to class, he still made one.
Why lengthen out the tale? he kept me chaste,
Which is the crown of virtue, undisgraced
In deed and name: he feared not lest one day
The world should talk of money thrown away,
If after all I plied some trade for hire,
Like him, a tax-collector, or a crier:
Nor had I murmured: as it is, the score
Of gratitude and praise is all the more.
No: while my head's unturned; I ne'er shall need
To blush for that dear father, or to plead
As men oft plead, 'tis Nature's fault, not mine,
I came not of a better, worthier line.

(i. 6. 68-92, tr. Conington.)

From here we may pass conveniently to the fourth satire of the same book. Like two others, it is literary, and in part also apologetic, discussing the nature of Satire and its most appropriate form. Horace denies that his object is to inflict pain or gratify mere spite, and so continues:

BUT if I still seem personal and bold,
Perhaps you'll pardon, when my story's told.
When my good father taught me to be good,
Scarecrows he took of living flesh and blood.
Thus, if he warned me not to spend but spare

The moderate means I owe to his wise care
 Twas See the life that son of Albius leads !
 Observe that Barrus vilest of ill weeds !
 An useful lesson this to all young heirs
 To guard against extravagance like theirs

(l 4 103 III tr Conington¹)

Later he turns to his own method of self-discipline and demands forgiveness for his most frequent offence

THUS I grew up unstained by serious ill
 Though venial faults I grant you haunt me still
 Yet items I could name retrenched e'en there
 By time plain speaking individual care
 For when I chance to stroll or lounge alone
 I'm not without a Mentor of my own
 This course were better that might help to mend
 My daily life improve me as a friend
 There some one showed ill breeding can I say
 I might not fall into the like one day ?
 So with closed lips I ruminate and then
 In leisure moments play with ink and pen
 For that's an instance I must needs avow
 Of those small faults I hinted at just now
 Grant it your prompt indulgence or a throng
 Of poets shall come up some hundred strong
 And by mere numbers in your own despite
 Force you like Jew to be our pro elyte

(l 4 129-143 tr Conington)

The satires of the first book range in date from about 42-35 B.C., those of the second from 34-30. It was in the winter of 38/37 that Horace first became friendly with Maecenas and about four years later that he was presented with his Sabine farm. Success and the country suns so mellowed the complexion of his work

The last two lines are taken from the version of F. Howes (1895)

The school where great tall urchins in a row,
 Sons of great tall centurions, used to go,
 With slate and satchel on their backs, to pay
 Their monthly quota punctual to the day,
 And took his boy to Rome, to learn the arts
 Which knight or senator to his imparts.
 Whoe'er had seen me, neat and more than neat,
 With slaves behind me, in the crowded street,
 Had surely thought a fortune fair and large,
 Two generations old, sustained the charge.
 Himself the true tried guardian of his son,
 Whene'er I went to class, he still made one.
 Why lengthen out the tale? he kept me chaste,
 Which is the crown of virtue, undisgraced
 In deed and name: he feared not lest one day
 The world should talk of money thrown away,
 If after all I plied some trade for hire,
 Like him, a tax-collector, or a crier:
 Nor had I murmured: as it is, the score
 Of gratitude and praise is all the more.
 No: while my head's unturned; I ne'er shall need
 To blush for that dear father, or to plead
 As men oft plead, 'tis Nature's fault, not mine,
 I came not of a better, worthier line.

(i. 6. 68-92, tr. Conington.)

From here we may pass conveniently to the fourth satire of the same book. Like two others, it is literary, and in part also apologetic, discussing the nature of Satire and its most appropriate form. Horace denies that his object is to inflict pain or gratify mere spite, and so continues:

BUT if I still seem personal and bold,
 Perhaps you'll pardon, when my story's told.
 When my good father taught me to be good,
 Scarecrows he took of living flesh and blood.
 Thus, if he warned me not to spend but spare

The moderate means I owe to his wise care,
 'Twas, ' See the life that son of Albius leads !
 Observe that Barrus, vilest of ill weeds !
 An useful lesson this to all young heirs
 To guard against extravagance like theirs '

(l 4 103-111, tr Conington¹)

Later, he turns to his own method of self-discipline, and demands forgiveness for his most frequent offence

THUS I grew up, unstained by serious ill,
 Though venial faults, I grant you, haunt me still
 Yet items I could name retrenched e'en there
 By time, plain speaking individual care,
 For, when I chance to stroll or lounge alone,
 I'm not without a Mentor of my own
 ' This course were better that might help to mend
 My daily life, improve me as a friend
 There some one showed ill breeding ' can I say
 I might not fall into the like one day ?'
 So with closed lips I ruminate, and then
 In leisure moments play with ink and pen
 For that's an instance I must needs avow,
 Of those small faults I hunted at just now
 Grant it your prompt indulgence, or a throng
 Of poets shall come up some hundred strong,
 And by mere numbers, in your own despite,
 Force you like Jews to be our proselyte

(l 4 129-143, tr Conington.)

The satires of the first book range in date from about 42-35 B. C.; those of the second from 34-30. It was in the winter of 38/37 that Horace first became friendly with Maecenas, and about four years later that he was presented with his Sabine farm. Success and the country suns so mellowed the complexion of his work

¹ The last two lines are taken from the version of F. Howes (1895)

The midnight sky was bending over all,
 When they set foot within a stately hall,
 Where couches of wrought ivory had been spread
 With gorgeous coverlets of Tyrian red,
 And viands piled up high in baskets lay,
 The relics of a feast of yesterday.
 Placing the rustic on a sumptuous seat,
 Himself officiates and prolongs the treat,
 With busy speed from fish to pastry springs,
 And like a saucy slave tastes all he brings.

The guest, rejoicing in his altered fare,
 Assumes in turn a genial diner's air,
 When hark! a sudden banging of the door:
 Each from his couch is tumbled on the floor;
 Half dead they scurry round the room, poor things,
 While the whole house with barking mastiffs rings.
 Then thus the rustic: 'Friend, excuse my haste;
 Farewell! this life may suit a town-bred taste:
 Remote from danger rather let me dwell
 Cheer'd with a vetch-stalk in my wild-wood cell.'

(ii. 6. 80-117, tr. adapted from F. Howes and Conington.)

Three satires, in the tradition of Ennius' gastronomic precepts, are devoted to the pleasures and pains of the Table. They are written with appreciation of a good menu, but ridicule extravagance no less than meanness, and expose bad taste. Here Horace advocates a generous but simple life, quoting Ofellus, a farmer of the old type, whose land has passed to one of Octavian's veterans:

MY rule was never to exceed (he says)
 My greens and smoke-dried fitch on common days:
 And even if the friend I held most dear
 Knock'd at my gate, unseen for many a year,—
 Or if a neighbour on some rainy day
 Dropt in to chat a leisure hour away,
 We pledged it not o'er dainties fetch'd from town,

But the fat kid and barn-door fowl went down,
 The cloth removed, grapes which myself had dried,
 With figs and nuts, a plain dessert supplied -
 And, as around the jocund grace-cup went,
 'Fill' was the word and Shame the president
 Whiles Ceres worshipp'd with libations due—
 (So might she still the full-eared crop renew !)
 Bade us from toil a pleasing respite share
 And smooth'd awhile the wrinkled brow of care

Let Fortune rave and wanton as she list,—
 From such a life how little can be miss'd !
 Say, are our looks less blithsome or our frame
 Less stout, my boys, since this new stranger came ?
 For view'd as property, the land, my sons,
 Is neither his, nor mine, nor any one's.
 He turn'd me out, and him his own excess
 Or the law's quirks still shortly dispossess
 At best, stern Death's ejection, soon or late,
 Shall prove these acres but a life-estate

(ll 2 116-132, tr F. Howes)

Horace was not, in any true sense, a philosopher, but he gave an added interest to moral philosophy, and we can see him in the Satires feeling his way from the Epicurean towards the Stoic faith. Elsewhere (II vii) Davus, one of his slaves, proves that the true philosopher alone is free—all other men, including Horace, are mastered by conflicting desires. Here Damasippus, ruined by his dealings in antiques, quotes the doctrine of a Stoic friend who had saved him from suicide. It is another paradox,—that the 'wise man' alone is free. This lively anecdote helps to illustrate the point.

OPIMIUS who, with gold and silver store
 Lodged in his coffers, ne'ertheless was poor
 (The man would drink from earthen nipperkin Flat wine on working-days, on feast-days thin),
 Once fell into a lethargy so deep
 That his next heir supposed it more than sleep,

Be cautious in attack, observe the mean
 And neither be too lukewarm, nor too keen
 Much talk annoys the testy and morose,
 But 'tis not well to be reserved and close
 Act Davus in the drama droop your head,¹
 And use the gestures of a man in dread
 Be all attention if the wind is brisk
 Say, 'Wrap that precious head up' run no risk!
 Push shouldering through a crowd, the way to clear
 Before him, when he maunders prick your ear
 He craves for praise administer the puff
 Till lifting up both hands he cries 'Enough'
 But when rewarded and released at last
 You gain the end of all your service past
 And not in dreams but soberly awake
 Hear 'One full quarter let Ulysses tale'
 Say, once or twice And is good Dama dead?
 Where shall I find his like for heart and head?
 If possible, shed tears at least conceal
 The tell tale smiles that speak the joy you feel

(ll 5 84-104, tr Conington)

This satire may be compared with Swift's Advice to Servants
 It has an irony which is uncommon even in Juvenal

The satire generally known as the 'Apocolocyntosis' or 'Pumpkinification' of the emperor Claudius (A B 41-54) takes us back to the Menippean type in which prose narrative has interludes of verse. The authorship is uncertain but there are as good reasons for assigning it to the philosopher LUCIUS ANNAEUS SENECÆ (ob A B 65²) as to any one. The satire opens with the words 'I wish to place on record the proceedings in heaven
 October 13 last', and then describes the fortunes of Claudius in his last hours on earth and in seeking admission to the place to

The reference is uncertain. Davus was a common slave name

¹ See p 154 n 1

² See pp 181 ff 330 ff 4 6 ff 487

which good emperors go. The gods hold debate on his eligibility to become one of themselves. Out of regard for his kinship with the deified Augustus and Augusta it has been proposed 'that from this day forth the blessed Claudius be a god, to enjoy that honour with all its appurtenances in as full a degree as any other before him, and that a note to that effect be added to Ovid's Metamorphoses':¹

THE meeting was divided, and it looked as though Claudius was to win the day. For Hercules² saw his iron was in the fire, trotted here and trotted there, saying, 'Don't deny me; I make a point of the matter. I'll do as much for you again when you like; you roll my log, and I'll roll yours: one hand washes another.' Then arose the blessed Augustus, when his turn came, and spoke with much eloquence. 'I call you to witness, my lords and gentlemen,' said he, 'that since the day I was made a god I have never uttered one word. I always mind my own business. But now I can keep on the mask no longer, nor conceal the sorrow which shame makes all the greater. Is it for this I have made peace by land and sea? For this I have calmed intestine wars? For this, laid a firm foundation of law for Rome, adorned it with buildings, and all that,—gentlemen, words fail me: there are none can rise to the height of my indignation. I must borrow the saying of the eloquent Messala Corvinus,³ 'I am ashamed of my authority'. This man, my lords, who looks as though he could not worry a fly, used to chop off heads as easily as a dog sits down.' (§§ 9-10, tr. W. H. D. Rouse.)

Augustus (whose style is parodied) finds that Claudius, apart from physical disqualifications, has murdered far too many members of the Royal Family, and secures his banishment from heaven. Every shortcoming of Claudius is exposed to ridicule, most of all his stupidity. It was only when he saw his funeral train, wending its way from heaven to hell, that he 'knew that

¹ See p. 242.

² Though the son of Zeus, his mother was a mortal, and his elevation to divine rank had been resented, especially by Hera. See p. 251.

³ He resigned his appointment to a high civil position within a week.

he was dead ' Finally he is sentenced—unheard, of course—to engage for ever in his favourite pastime, the rattling of dice, but with a proviso like that of the 'twisted cue and elliptical billiard balls'

FOR when he rattled with the box, and thought he now had got 'em,

The little cubes would vanish thro the perforated bottom
Then he would pick 'em up again and once more set a trying.
The dice but served him the same trick away they went a flying
So still he tries, and still he fails, still searching long he lingers,
And every time the tricky things go slipping thro his fingers
(§ 15 tr W H D Rouse)

Probably the emperor was transformed into a pumpkin to escape, like Ovid's heroines some ultimate indignity. But our manuscript ends with the arrival of Caligula who proves Claudius his slave in virtue of many a flogging administered in the past and makes him over as law-clerk to a freedman. The slang and colloquialisms of the piece are difficult to match outside Petronius its parodies and irreverence look back to the Menippus whose laugh is heard in Lucian.

Of AULUS PERSIUS FLACCUS (A D 34-62¹) we are told that 'he was of the gentlest disposition, of a maidenly modesty, and exemplary in his dutiful affection for his mother, sister, and aunt. Rejecting not unwisely, all thought of an active life, he surrounded himself with a library that contained at his death no less than 700 volumes of the Stoic Chrysippus, and fired by the somewhat negative idealism of the Stoic creed, sought ardently to reform a world he did not know. As the result of reading the tenth book of Lucilius, in which the writer after disparaging himself extends the process more heartily to other authors, he was moved to select satire as his weapon. Horace whom he seems to have known almost by heart, supplies him with many of his characters and incidents, but he is very different from Horace in his priest-like zeal, which precludes all compromise in his moral teaching and, in his outlook on life, detachment. It was only after his death, in his twenty-eighth year, that the Satires were published, a thin volume of six hexameter pieces, with a short prologue.

¹ See pp 376-7

Persius lived at a difficult time. The Augustans had conquered for Rome almost every province of Greek literature; their age had been succeeded by no great movement of national life or thought of a kind to inspire new conceptions; and they invited imitation only to defy it. Poetry was content to revive the worn fields of their conquest with Audacity, and embellish them with flowers of Rhetoric; and as Rhetoric, since the loss of political freedom, had been more occupied with the manner than the matter of speech, it was prodigal of the flowers required. The First Satire is a protest against this literary decline, which Persius, like most Stoics, attributes to moral degeneracy, and an attendant dishonesty in criticism. Here he is addressing, in imagination, a titled composer who has been flattered by dependents into some self-esteem:

YOUR table's laid: sow's-flesh, and piping hot.
 Enter your guest, shivering, poor fellow; gets
 A cast-off cloak for present. All at once
 'Tell me,' you ask, '—you know how I love truth,—
 What says Rome of me?' Truth he cannot tell.
 I'll tell you. Ready?—'Bald-pate, you're a fool!
 Your paunch (eighteen good inches on the ribs)
 Was never built for verse!'

—Ah, happy Janus,
 No waggish stork can clip you from behind,
 No fingers perk'd like some white ass's ears,
 No stretch of tongue to match Apulian dog's
 In thirsty weather! You, my high-born friends,
 Living with eyeless occiput, should learn
 To turn about, and face the back-stair gibe. (i. 53-62.)

A youthful twist of humour, a certain vivacity of phrase and description, the use of vulgar speech and even slang—all are apparent in this passage. It is also typical of Persius's use of metaphor, designed in some places to disguise a Horatian 'tag', in others to challenge the reader's learning and ingenuity, or prove the author's. Here we must know that Janus had two faces, looking forward and back; that various signs of mockery were to tap the fingers against the hand in imitation of a stork's bill, to move them like ass's ears, or to put out the tongue, and finally that an epithet in Horace makes the droughts of Apulia, in the dog-days, proverbial

The remaining satires are all Stoic discourses, with human weaknesses for text. The quotation that follows is a development of the paradox that the man of perfect wisdom alone is free. Abrupt transitions of thought and a form of dialogue in which (after the manner of a Stoic diatribe) the speakers are not clearly marked, often help to make Persius obscure. Here Avarice and Luxury, personified, are fighting to possess a merchant's soul. He is addressed first by Persius and then by the disputants in their turns as 'you

DAYBREAK You're snoring, lumpish 'Show a leg!'
Says Avarice, 'Up with you!' No answer 'Up!'
— No, no, I can't! Comes nearer, 'ups' again
— 'Well, what's the matter?' — 'Matter? Sir! Salt fish
Begging a freight from Pontus¹ beaver-oil
Tow ebony, frankincense, and glossy Coans²!
Be first with peppercorns fresh peppercorns
The loaded camel brings, waiting his water
Up with you! Buy or barter! Needs, forswear.'³ — 'Forswear? But God will hear me?' — 'Sorry fool!
Must live content to scrape salt-cellar through,⁴
Sick with the thumb taste if you'd square with God!'

You're up and belted wine-skins on the slaves
Straps, everything Quick aboard! No stopping now
Your tonnage built to scour Aegean leagues!
But comes sly Luxury,— What? Off?' she asks,
Holding your button 'Where hot fool, and why?
It's masterful this humour, needs, to cool it

The Black Sea ¹ The fabrics from the island of Cos in the Aegean

² Cp Conrad Lord Jim ch. xxii. The passion for pepper seemed to burn like a flame of love in the breast of Dutch and English adventurers about the time of James the First. For a bag of pepper they would cut each other's throats without hesitation and would forswear their souls³

⁴ To scrape the salt-cellar with the thumb or 'live on salt' were proverbial expressions for a life of extreme poverty or frugality

More than one chemist's shop ! What, you to sea ?
 Perched on a thwart, coiled cable at your back,
 Tippling the flat Veientan, rank with pitch,
 From a squab noggin¹ ? And for what ? To squeeze
 Greedy percentages from your nursed stocks,
 Make five, by sweat, eleven !—My good Sir,
 Spare yourself ! Gather the rosebuds, you with me ;
 This life is ours to-day, ashes to-morrow,
 A ghost, a tale that's told. Bear death in mind,
 And live the merrier ! Even as I speak
 The light-heel'd hour is gone : present is past !'

Well, what to do ? hooked here, hooked there, and torn
 Two ways,—which tug to follow ? Each in turn
 Obeying, shirking, at the last you stand,
 Deny one mistress flatly to her face,
 And cry ' My chain is loosed ! '—Alas, poor dog,
 Struggling may slip the knot, but as you fly
 The collar's fast, the chain's length drags behind !

(v. 132-160.)

When the satires were published they met with immediate acclamation, which has been echoed at intervals in the past and must be ascribed mainly to certain passages where Persius's broken rhythms gather volume and sound and seem (in spite of some rhetorical colouring) to be the expression of a passionate sincerity. Something of this feeling may be conveyed by the quotations which follow. The first is from a satire on the proper objects and methods of prayer. Mankind is here rebuked for offering gold to the gods as if they shared the cupidity of their votaries :

SOULS bowed to earth, empty of light divine !
 Why bring our passions to the Immortals' shrine
 And judge by ours their pleasure ? O vile flesh,
 That first with perfume spoilt the olive fresh,

¹ A poor kind of wine, drunk from a poor kind of ware. 'Squab noggin', a rendering borrowed from Conington, represents an archaic vulgarism in the original.

Pure wool with purples from the oyster tore
 Its pearl and raked raw clay for glowing ore !
 We sin we sin yet gain our earthly ends
 But temples rich with gold my priestly friends
 Tell me what profit they ? No more believe
 Than dolls that growing girls to Venus give !¹

Offer to Heaven what from a lordly dish
 Dull-eyed Messala² cannot be our wish
 To show for sacrifice a heart that keeps
 Good faith with God and man its inner deeps
 Holy its truth and honour tried by fire !
 Grant this and God shall grant me my desire
 When at his shrine I supplication make
 Though all my offering be a barley-cake (ll 61-75)³

The next is a passage from the Third Satire which deals with the moral waste of life among those who have lost the true philosophy as guide and the penalty they pay of knowing that it is too late to mend. No lines in Persius have been more often quoted than those in which he invokes on tyrants the secret terrors of that knowledge

GREAT Father of the Gods ! when ruthless kings
 Fired inwardly by Passion's poison stings
 Wax hot in lust be this one vengeance thine —
 Show to them Virtue's face and let them pine
 Rotten with longing for an old love lost !

What wrings the groan of torment innermost ?
 No brazen bull⁴ of Sicily loud with pain
 No sword hung poised to cleave the neck in twain

Ma dens dedicated the r dolls to Venus on attaining womanhood
 Similarly the golden charm-case (bulla) worn by free-born boys was offered to the household gods

Refers probably to a notorious ep cure of distinguished families

¹ The translation is partly from Gifford's version

The allusion is to the brazen bull of Phalaris tyrant of Agrigentum in which men were roasted alive their cries passed for the bellowings of the bull. Its first victim was Perillus the inventor of the torture the last Phalaris

The purpled neck, at mercy of a thread
 Slung from the golden trceries overhead ;¹
 Not these ! but that small voice a man may hear,— ‘ Lower I fall and lower, to ruin sheer,’
 —And, stricken, pales within, nor dares to tell
 His wife beside him whence the stroke befell.

(iii. 35-42.)

The Fifth Satire, from which our second quotation came, is modelled on the Seventh in Horace's second book ; but before turning to his main subject Persius makes a sincere acknowledgment to the great Stoic teacher Cornutus. Possibly he was thinking of Horace and his father when he was moved to write it :

WHEN first I laid the purple by²—and, free,
 Yet trembling at my new-felt liberty,
 Approach'd the hearth, and on the Lares hung
 The bulla, from my willing neck unstrung ;
 When gay associates, sporting at my side,
 And the white boss, display'd with conscious pride,
 Gave me, uncheck'd, the haunts of vice to trace,
 And throw my wandering eyes on every face ;
 When life's perplexing maze before me lay,
 And error, heedless of the better way,
 To straggling paths, far from the route of truth,
 Woo'd, with blind confidence, my timorous youth,
 I fled to you, Cornutus, pleased to rest
 My hopes and fears on your Socratick breast ;
 Nor did you, gentle Sage, the charge decline :
 Then, dextrous to beguile, your steady line
 Reclaim'd, I know not by what winning force,
 My morals, warp'd from virtue's straighter course,

¹ The ' sword of Damocles '.

² i.e. when he exchanged the purple-striped dress of boyhood for the white ' toga ' of a man. The folds of the toga were gathered in a knot or ' boss ' on the left shoulder. On the ' bulla ', see p. 305, note 1.

While reason press'd incumbent on my soul
That struggled to receive the strong control
And took like wax subdued by plastick skill
The form your hand imposed—and bears it still!

(v. 30-40 tr Gifford.)

In another Horatian satire on the reasonable enjoyment of wealth Persius denounces the cupidity of an imaginary heir but how different was his experience in fact! He bequeathed to his mother and sister 2 000 000 sesterces begging them to give Cornutus 100 000 twenty pounds weight of silver plate and the whole of his library Cornutus refused all except the books¹

DECIMUS JUNIUS JUVENALIS (c. 60-140 A.D.) has left sixteen satires of which the last is incomplete. He is the most prolific of the verse satirists yet in some ways the narrowest. Except in the eighth and some of the later pieces he tends to confine himself to an attack on vice and folly delivered in a spirit of stormy pessimism. The variety and humour of Lucilius and Horace are missing so too the informal charm of their manner and versification for Juvenal's satires are set pieces with more openly calculated effects. As a moralist he will not compare with Persius he is more apt to expose vice than to enjoin virtue and dwells too intimately on the exposure. All these are marked differences. Another perhaps the most noticeable is that he tells us nothing of himself.

None of the satires appeared before the third year of Trajan (A.D. 98-117) when the Roman world was looking forward with new hopes. Juvenal looks back and flogs dead men of the reigns of Domitian and Nero. If we add that the whole cast of his work is rhetorical² and that many of his themes are stock subjects for declamation grave doubts arise of his sincerity. Probably he is best thought of as a man of some bitter memories and a naturally satiric temperament keenly aware of the perennial disorders of a great capital yet forced by prudence to spare the living and preferring historic 'scarecrows' to fictitious names. The power of his writing argues something greater than mere rhetorical skill in making old themes new; and no one would dispute a genuine warmth of feeling for the poor and the oppressed. In detail his style shows all the faults of Silver Latin, but also its excellences in their highest development; and his command of the hexameter is unrivalled in post-Augustan poetry. If a man's posterity counts for anything, he is the greatest of the satirists: he is certainly the most 'modern' and the most quotable.

¹ Cf. H. E. Butler Poet Augustan Poetry (Clarendon Press 1907) p. 81.

² i.e. addressed to an auditor rather than a reader. He asks questions and exclaims abundantly in antitheses and rounds off his topics with epigrams that seem to await (and generally deserve) applause. The statement of an ancient biographer that he practised declamation until middle life before turning satirist is easily believed.

The First Satire sets the key for most of the rest. Disgusted, as Persius had been, at the trite mythologizing of contemporary poets, Juvenal was determined to look facts in the face, and to ask what they meant. Though nearer to Lucilius than Horace, he quotes the example of both; and, after parading a number of unlovely figures, approaches his climax. Ennius's gout was a kindlier muse than Juvenal's anger:

WHO would not, reckless of the swarm he meets,
Fill his wide tablets in the publick streets
With angry verse? when, through the mid-day glare,
Born by six slaves, and in an open chair,
The forger comes, who owes his lavish state
To a wet seal, and a fictitious date;
Comes, like the soft Maecenas,¹ lolling by,
And impudently braves the publick eye!
Or the rich dame, who stanch'd her husband's thirst
With generous bowis, but—drugg'd them deeply first!
Now, baffling old Locusta² in her skill,
She shows her simpler neighbours how to kill,
And bids them bear the spotted corpse along,
Nor heed the curses of the indignant throng.

Dare then, the deed that earns, and earns it well,
A crib in sea-clipt Gyara,³ or the cell:

¹ The patron of Virgil and Horace. His effeminacy is freely referred to by post-Augustan writers.

² A Gallic woman who served Nero as court-poisoner and was executed by Galba.

³ In the Aegean. Confinement in an island (with other penalties) was a common punishment in Imperial times.

'Tis crime gets Substance let your crime be hold !
 Virtue gets Praise,—and blows her nails for cold
 To crime men owe their manors, high commands,
 Their Orbs, and antique plate with goat that stands
 Boss'd to the life in silver ! Who shall sleep
 When Roman wives their dark appointments keep Led by the lure of riches—and to whom ?
 A husband's father in a husband's room !
 When maid betrothed her maidenhood demeans
 And matrons look for gallants in their 'teens ?
 How shall I sleep ? No sleep for honest eyes !
 Anger shall give what mother wit denies,
 And pour, in Nature and the Nine's despite,
 Such strains as I or Cluvienus¹ write !

(1 63-80)²

It is at the end of this satire that he states his resolve to assail only the dead 'whose ashes lie sepulchred beneath the Flammian and the Latin roads'. The Fourth shows his skill in bringing the dead to life. A cabinet-council has been called to decide the proper treatment of a huge fish, sent, perforce, as a present to Domitian (A D 81-96). The entry of the courtiers is here described

MONTANUS belly next appear'd in sight,
 Then his legs tottering with the unwieldy weight,
 Crispinus follow'd daub'd with more perfume,
 Thus early ! than two funerals consume
 Then Pompey, neater in the Royal game
 Of cutting throats with a soft whisper, came Next Fuscus,³ of the Marble Grange, whose meat
 Fattened to make a Dacian vultures' treat

¹ A forgotten poet

² Tr. by Gifford (1906) partly from the version of J. Bide (1734)

³ Prefect of the Praetorian Guard killed in Domitian's Dacian wars

For Doom was waiting, with an order seal'd
 To try his arm-chair tactics in the field.
 Cautious Veiento next, and by his side
 Bloody Catullus,¹ leaning on his guide ;
 A sightless yet an ardent lover he,
 Fired at the thought of charms he could not see ;
 A prodigy, whose monumental crimes
 Strike with amaze even these prodigious times,—
 Blind toady, from a bridge-end beggar's stand
 Rais'd to the Highest Murderer in the land !
 True wheel-side cadger of the hill-top road,
 Who'd blow his kiss to each descending load !
 None dwelt so largely on the turbot's size,
 Or raised with more applause his wondering eyes ;
 But to the left (O treacherous want of sight !)
 He pour'd his praise ;—the fish was on the right.

(iv. 107-21.)²

To Juvenal 'bad-form' (no less than obesity) was the outward sign of a degenerate soul. He sets it on the same plane as bad morals, and judges both by the standards of Old Rome, so agreeable to those of Stoicism. The Eighth Satire, an expansion of the Stoic text that virtue is the one true nobility, takes us back to the two great roads, where we find Lateranus, a nobleman, and consul-elect of A. D. 65, profaning the monuments of a still remoter past—by driving his own gig ! Similarly Gracchus, in Satire ii, caps his abominable vices by appearing as gladiator in public shows. This provokes an appeal to famous shades :

THAT there be ghosts and regions underground,
 That Charon's pole still plumbs the Stygian Sound,
 Home of dark frogs, where thousands in a day
 The souls in one small punt find passage-way,—
 No one believes, or none who pays a fee

¹ Consul in A.D. 73, and was still living in 93. Like Pompey and Veiento, he was a notorious 'informer'.

² Tr. mainly from Gifford ; but in part also from the version of R. Duke in Dryden's Juvenal (1692).

At hath-bouse wicket where the child goes free ¹
 Yet grant the fable true, and then declare
 What thoughts are theirs, those mighty men of war,—
 Curius, the Scipios Camillus' ghost,
 Fabricius, Fabii of Créméra's ² host,
 All our young chivalry at Cannae slain,
 Spirits fordone of many a battle plain—
 What thoughts are theirs, whence'er with feet unblest
 Our modern Nobleman invades their rest?
 They'd long to purge the unclean touch away,
 Given torches, sulphur, and a laurel spray!
 To them poor We must go and shall we boast
 Our armies flung beyond the Irish coast,
 Beyond our new won Orkneys, and the skies
 Where briefest night contents the Briton's eyes ³
 Vain boast! when vice befouls Imperial Rome
 Such as her subjects never learnt at home!

(u 149-63) ⁴

The 'subjects' Juvenal has in mind are 'young barbarians' from the outposts of empire. In Satire 14—perhaps his best—his thoughts are nearer home. He shows us the young Roman corrupted and preyed upon by all the pests of the Levant. His friend Umbricius, halted beneath 'the dripping Capene gate', is justifying a removal to the country.

THE people by the great most favour'd now,
 Most shunn'd by me, I hasten to avow
 I cannot, Romans rule my spleen, and see
 A Grecian capital in Italy I—
 Grecian! O, no with this vast sewer compared,

¹ Men paid a copper for admission to the public baths. boys below a certain age paid nothing

² In the battle of Créméra 300 members of the Fabian 'family' were killed

³ There is some reason to believe that Juvenal himself served as a soldier in Great Britain—perhaps in the west of Scotland

⁴ Tr partly adapted from the versions of Sir R. Stapylton (1660) and Gifford

The dregs of Greece are scarcely worth regard :
 Long since, the stream that wanton Syria laves
 Has disembogued its filth in Tiber's waves,
 Its language, arts ; o'erwhelm'd us with the scum
 Of Antioch's streets, its minstrels, harp, and drum.
 Hie to the Circus ! ye who pant to prove
 A barbarous mistress, an outlandish love ;
 Hie to the Circus ! there in crowds they stand,
 Tires on their head, and timbrels in their hand.

Thy rustick, Mars, the trechedipna¹ wears,
 And on his breast, rank with ceroma, bears
 A paltry prize, well-pleased ; while every land,
 Sicyon, and Amydos, and Alaband,
 Tralles, and Samos, and a thousand more,
 Thrive on his indolence, and daily pour
 Their starving myriads forth : hither they come,
 And batten on the genial soil of Rome ;
 The minions, then the lords, of every princely dome !
 A flattering, cringing, treacherous, artful race,
 Of fluent tongue, and never-blushing face ;
 A Protean tribe, one knows not what to call,
 That shifts to every form, and shines in all :
 Grammarian, painter, augur, rhetorician,
 Geometer, quack, conjurer, and musician,
 All arts his own the hungry Greekling counts,
 And bid him mount the sky, the sky he mounts !

(iii. 58-78, tr. Gifford.)

¹ Juvenal purposely uses the Greek word, which means literally 'run-to-dinner-wear'—probably light slippers worn by Greek parasites. Ceroma was the Greek name for wrestlers' unguent. Wrestling, a Greek sport, was despised by Romans of the old school.

'At Rome', Umbrius adds, 'wealth is omnipotent. The word of a poor man is not believed, and the rich make sport of his appearance.' Here he continues.

THE feverish poor, by every sound distress,
Curse the slow bours, and die for want of rest
Sleep visits not their couch it costs too dear,
And hence disease makes such wild havoc here
The carts' loud rumbling through the narrow way,
The drivers' clamours at each casual stay,
From drowsy Drusus¹ would his slumber take,
And keep the calves of Proteus broad awake!

If business call, obsequious crowds divide,
While o'er their heads the rich securely ride,
And read, or write or sleep within,—for close
The litter, and the gloom invites repose
Yet reach they first the goal, while, by the throng
Elbow'd and jostled, scarce we creep along,
Sharp strokes from poles, tubs, rafters, doom'd to feel,
Bespatter'd o'er with mud, from head to heel,
While the rude soldier gores us as he goes,
And marks, in blood, his progress on our toes!

See from the Dole² a vast tumultuous throng,
Each follow'd by his kitchen, pours along!
Huge pans, which Corbulo³ could scarce uprear,
With steady neck a wretched slave must bear,
And, lest amid the way the flames expire,
Glide numbly on and, gliding fan the fire,
Through the close press with sinuous efforts wind,
And, piece by piece, leave his botch'd rags behind

(iu 232-254, tr Gifford)

¹ The somnolent emperor Claudius (r. A. D. 41-54) is meant. His original name was Tiberius Claudius Drusus. The sea-calves or seals of the god Proteus were also proverbial for their heavy sleep.

² 'Mess' would be more accurate than 'Dole'. The poorer people sometimes had meals in common. Food was brought in large chafin-dishes.

³ An eminent general under Claudius and Nero, famed also for his stature and strength.

Johnson's London is modelled on this satire : and he and his times were in ready sympathy with the Fifth and Seventh, which deal with the abuse, or lack, of patronage in more than one aspect. Piety suggests a short quotation from the 'Plaint of the Impoverished Schoolmaster' contained in the Seventh. 'There is nothing', Juvenal says, 'on which the modern parent will spend less than on the education of his son'—and so looks back again to Old Rome :

GRANT Heav'n, that gentle weightlesse Earth may lie
On our fore-fathers' bones, and sprout on high
In flow'rs, which to the Aire perfumes may bring,
Cloathing their Urns in a perpetuall Spring,
Because a Tutor they did still repute
To be the sacred Parent's substitute.

(vii. 207-210, tr. Stapylton.)

His sympathy with the poor is based on experiences as a client ; but at some time he came to possess not only a town house but two country estates. In the Eleventh Satire he invites a friend, Persicus, to his farm at Tibur, and tells him what hospitality he may expect :

I SHUN the stuck-up guest who points
Comparisons, and scoffs at humble joints.
I've not an ounce of ivory : dice or chess,
No piece is made of that stuff, I confess.
The very handles of my knives are bone ;
Still for all that my fish I've never known
Go bad, or found the chicken cut less tender.
True, I've no carver to whom all must surrender, Trained at the Guildhall School of Carving, where Wild-boar and antelope and succulent hare,
Crimean pheasant, Brobdignagian duck,
And one-horned goat exported from Kalmuck,
A dummy knife¹ carves with such skilful swish
That Guildhall rings ; a model every dish !
A slice of venison or guinea-fowl
My fellow cannot steal, for he's an owl,

The art of carving was taught by means of wooden models.

No adept thief except of crumbs of cake
 Quite common glass bought cheap your thirst will slake
 Fill'd by a country wench in homespun clad
 Not French or Chinese or some Negro-lad
 My servants all wear homespun hair cropp'd straight
 And comb'd the day alone when they've to wait
 That one's a shepherd's son a cowherd's this,
 His mother long not seen he'll sigh and miss
 His cottage home the kids that to him ran
Gentle of face in honour gentleman!

(xi 129 154 tr. modernized by H. I. Rogers)

This piece is not the less charming for its long ancestry in satira. The Sixth longest and most elaborate of all is in Juvenal's earlier manner. If we take his rhetoric seriously we must suppose him to have been either an injured husband or like Lucilius and Horace a bachelor for the whole satire (addressed nominally to a friend about to marry) is a denunciation of womankind unrelieved in its pessimism. The Roman marriage system invited disaster and much harm had also been done by the tragic desire of Roman matrons to out rival the physical and mental attractions of a foreign demi-monde and by their habit of flying for emotional relief to exotic cults. But fortunately we need never look to Juvenal for strict historical truth. He confuses past and present he exposes only the worst side of the worst classes and he exaggerates the evils he selects. Perhaps the most readable part is his sketch of the learned woman despite its pleonasm and over-drawing.

BUT she is more intolerable yet
 Who plays the critick when at board she's set—
 Calls Virgil charming and attempts to prove
 Poor Dido right in venturing all for love
 From Maro and Maconides¹ she quotes
 The striking passages and while she notes
 Their beauties and defects adjusts her scales
 And accurately weighs which bard prevails
 The astonish'd guests sit mute grammarians yield
 Loud rhetoricians baffled quit the field

¹ i.e. from Virgil and Homer

Even auctioneers and lawyers stand aghast,
 And not a woman speaks!—So thick and fast
 The wordy shower descends, that you would swear
 A thousand bells were jangling in your ear,
 A thousand basins clattering. Vex no more
 Your trumpets and your timbrels, as of yore,
 To ease the labouring moon¹; her single yell
 Can drown their clangour, and dissolve the spell.

She lectures too in Ethicks, and declaims
 On the CHIEF GOOD!—but, surely, she who aims
 To seem too learn'd the sophist's garb should wear,
 A hog, due offering, to Sylvanus² bear,
 And, to the farthing bath, with men repair!

O, never may the partner of my bed
 With subtleties of logick stuff her head;
 Nor whirl her rapid syllogisms around,
 Nor with imperfect enthymemes confound!
 Enough for me, if common things she know,
 And have the little learning schools bestow.
 I hate the female pedagogue, who pores
 O'er her Palaemon³ hourly; who explores
 All modes of speech, regardless of the sense,
 But tremblingly alive to mood and tense:
 Who puzzles me with many an uncouth phrase
 From some old canticle of Numa's days;
 Corrects her country friends, and cannot hear
 Her husband solecise without a sneer!

(vi. 434-456, tr. Gifford.)

Almost every type of woman described (and there are few omissions) can be paralleled from modern times. Sir T. Browne may have been infected with Juvenal's pessimism when he wrote

¹ It was believed that eclipses were caused by witchcraft, and that the sound of beaten copper, &c., broke the spell.

² Only men did sacrifice to this god. Juvenal means that she should do all men do, wear their dress, observe their ceremonies, and frequent the public baths. Cf. note 1, p. 311 above.

³ The most distinguished grammarian of the Early Empire.

(in 1646) 'There is a certain list of vices declaimed against by all authors, which digested into commonplaces may serve any theme and never be out of date till Doomsday' It is refreshing to turn to a later piece on 'Parental Responsibility', and find some gentler lines

THERE'S due unto a Child a great respect
 If thou do st any wickedness affect Slight not thy tender Infant coming in
 But let him stand betwixt thee and thy sin
 For, should thy Child doe anything that moves
 The Censor's wrath, since he not only proves
 In face and body like thee but the Son
 Ev'n of thy Manners since all he hath done
 Is walking in thy steps can st thou chastise
 And persecute him for it with thy cries
 Then disinherit him? What right hast Thou
 To speak so fatherly and knit the brow,
 That old, art worse?—thy giddy head design'd
 For cupping-glasses to let out the wind!

(xiv 47-58, tr after Stapylton)

The Tenth Satire, on 'The Vanity of Human Wishes', gave Johnson a second model. It is another rhetorical exercise in pessimism, and more powerful than the Sixth because of its more 'universal' character. This passage, confined to war like ambitions gives some idea of its philosophy and of its sound, and may remind us again of Sir T. Browne where he writes of 'the drums and trappings of three conquests and of 'Time which antiquates Antiquities and hath an art to make dust of all things

THE spoils of WAR the trunk in triumph placed¹
 With all the trophies of the battle graced
 Crush'd helms and batter'd shields, and streamers born
 From vanquish'd fleets and beams from chariots torn,

One form of trophy was a tree trunk with leaves stripped and branches lopped on it the captured spoils were hung. The mournful captives are figures sculptured on a triumphal arch

And captives ranged around in mournful state,
 Are prized as joys—beyond a mortal's fate :
 Fired with the love of these, what countless swarms,
 Barbarians, Romans, Greeks, have rush'd to arms,
 All danger slighted, and all toil defied,
 And madly conquer'd, or as madly died !
 So much the raging thirst of fame exceeds
 The generous warmth which prompts to worthy deeds,
 That none confess fair Virtue's genuine power,
 Or woo her to their breast, without a dower.
 Yet has this wild desire, in other days,
 This boundless avarice of a few for praise,
 This frantick rage for names to grace a tomb,
 Involved whole countries in one general doom :
 Vain rage ! the roots of the wild fig-tree rise,
 Strike through the marble, and—their memory dies !
 For, like their mouldering tenants, tombs decay,
 And, with the dust they hide, are swept away.
(x. 133-46, tr. Gifford.)

Most of the later satires are written round those philosophic commonplaces that were part of the food of Rhetoric ; yet we have no right to suppose that Juvenal adorned his moral texts without either conviction or sympathy. He reaches a high level in Satire xiii, where he argues that revenge is best left to a sinner's conscience ; and shortly after, that

'in the eye of heaven, a wicked deed
 Devis'd, is done ' (209-210, tr. Gifford.)

But perhaps the concluding lines of the Tenth are more striking. If all human wishes are vain, for what shall men pray ? He gives, like Persius, a Stoic answer :

SAY then, shall man, deprived all power of choice,
 Ne'er raise to Heaven the supplicating voice ?
 Not so ; but to the gods his fortunes trust :
 Their thoughts are wise, their dispensations just.
 What best may profit or delight they know,

And real good for fancied bliss bestow
 With eyes of pity they our frailties scan,
 More dear to them, than to himself, is man
 By blind desire, by headlong passion driven,
 For wife and heirs we daily weary Heaven,
 Yet still 'tis Heaven's prerogative to know
 If heirs, or wife, will bring us weal or woe

But, that thou mayst (for still 'tis good to prove
 Our humble hope) ask something from above
 Thy pious offerings to the temple bear,
 And, while the altars blaze be thus thy prayer

O THOU, who know'st the wants of human kind,
 Vouchsafe me health of body, health of mind,
 A soul prepared to meet the frowns of fate,
 And look undaunted on a future state,
 That reckons death a blessing yet can bear
 Existence nobly, with its weight of care,
 That anger and desire alike restrains,
 And counts Alcides' ¹ toils, and cruel pains,
 Superiour far to banquets, wanton nights,
 And all Sardanapalus' soft delights!

Here bound at length, thy wishes I but teach
 What blessings man by his own powers may reach
 THE PATH TO PEACE IS VIRTUE We should see,
 If wise, O Fortune, nought divine in thee
 But we have deified a name alone,
 And fix'd in heaven thy visionary throne!

(x 346-366, tr Gifford)

Perhaps all satirists are denied the full poetic gift, and avenge themselves on Nature by showing other imperfections in her bandiwork. But Juvenal, at his best, sails nearer to poetry than most.

¹ Alcides is another name for Hercules

And captives ranged around in mournful state,
 Are prized as joys—beyond a mortal's fate :
 Fired with the love of these, what countless swarms,
 Barbarians, Romans, Greeks, have rush'd to arms,
 All danger slighted, and all toil defied,
 And madly conquer'd, or as madly died !
 So much the raging thirst of fame exceeds
 The generous warmth which prompts to worthy deeds,
 That none confess fair Virtue's genuine power,
 Or woo her to their breast, without a dower.
 Yet has this wild desire, in other days,
 This boundless avarice of a few for praise,
 This frantick rage for names to grace a tomb,
 Involved whole countries in one general doom :
 Vain rage ! the roots of the wild fig-tree rise,
 Strike through the marble, and—their memory dies !
 For, like their mouldering tenants, tombs decay,
 And, with the dust they hide, are swept away.

(x. 133-46, tr. Gifford.)

Most of the later satires are written round those philosophic commonplaces that were part of the food of Rhetoric ; yet we have no right to suppose that Juvenal adorned his moral texts without either conviction or sympathy. He reaches a high level in Satire xiii, where he argues that revenge is best left to a sinner's conscience ; and shortly after, that

‘in the eye of heaven, a wicked deed
 Devis'd, is done’ (209-210, tr. Gifford.)

But perhaps the concluding lines of the Tenth are more striking. If all human wishes are vain, for what shall men pray ? He gives, like Persius, a Stoic answer :

SAY then, shall man, deprived all power of choice,
 Ne'er raise to Heaven the supplicating voice ?
 Not so ; but to the gods his fortunes trust :
 Their thoughts are wise, their dispensations just.
 What best may profit or delight they know,

And real good for fancied bliss bestow
 With eyes of pity they our frailties scan,
 More dear to them, than to himself, is man
 By blind desire, by headlong passion driven,
 For wife and heirs we daily weary Heaven,
 Yet still 'tis Heaven's prerogative to know
 If heirs, or wife, will bring us weal or woe

But, that thou mayst (for still 'tis good to prove
 Our humble hope) ask something from above,
 Thy pious offerings to the temple bear,
 And, while the altars blaze be this thy prayer

O THOU, who know'st the wants of human kind,
 Vouchsafe me health of body, health of mind;
 A soul prepared to meet the frowns of fate,
 And look undaunted on a future state,
 That reckons death a blessing yet can bear
 Existence nobly, with its weight of care,
 That anger and desire alike restrains,
 And counts Alcides' ¹ toils, and cruel pains
 Superiour far to banquets, wanton nights,
 And all Sardanapalus' soft delights!

Here bound at length, thy wishes I but teach
 What blessings man by his own powers may reach
 THE PATH TO PEACE IS VIRTUE We should see,
 If wise, O Fortune, nought divine in thee
 But we have deified a name alone,
 And fix'd in heaven thy visionary throne!

(x 346-366, tr Gifford)

Perhaps all satirists are denied the full poetic gift, and avenge themselves on Nature by showing other imperfections in her handiwork. But Juvenal, at his best, sails nearer to poetry than most.

¹ Alcides is another name for Hercules

better place either to drag on my miserable existence, or, what is preferable, to end it. I shall have few people about me, and shall get free from society.

Your letters never aroused my hopes as much as other people's : and yet my hopes were always fainter than your letters. However, since some kind of a move has been made in the matter, whatever kind it may be and whatsoever its cause, I will not disappoint either my dear and only brother's sad and touching entreaties, nor the promises of Sestius and others, nor the appeals of my wife in her deep affliction and my little Tullia in her misery, nor your own true-hearted letters. Epirus shall be my road back to freedom or to what I mentioned before.

I beg and beseech you, Pomponius, as you see how I have been robbed of my honours and of my dearest and fondest possessions by men's treachery, as you see how I was betrayed and cast aside by those on whose advice I relied, as you know how I was forced into betraying myself and my family, of your pity help me, and support my brother Quintus, who is not past salvation : guard Terentia and my children ; as for me, wait for me in Rome, if you think there is any chance of seeing me there. If not, come to see me, if you can, and allot me of your land enough for my body to rest in ; and send a man with letters as soon and as often as possible.

(Ad Atticum, iii. 19, 17. E. O. Winstedt.)

Here Cicero is writing in 54 B.C. to his brother Quintus, now serving as one of the principal staff-officers upon Julius Caesar's expedition to Britain.

Quintus, though lacking his brother's intellectual powers, was an efficient soldier, and Caesar appreciated his services.¹

WHEN you receive a letter from me by the hand of an amanuensis, you may be sure that I have not even a little leisure ; when by my own—a little. For let me tell you that in regard to causes and trials in court I have never been closer tied, and that, too, at the most unhealthy season of the year, and in the most oppressively hot weather. But these things, since you so direct me, I must put up with, and must not seem to have come short of the ideas and expectations which you and Caesar entertain of me, especially since, even if it were somewhat difficult not to do that, I am yet likely from this labour to reap great popularity and prestige. Accordingly, as you wish me to do, I take great pains not to hurt anyone's feelings, and to secure being liked even by those men who are most vexed at my close friendship with Caesar, while by those who are impartial, or even inclined to this side, I may be warmly courted and loved. When some very violent debates took place in the Senate on the subject of bribery for several days, because the candidates for the consulship had gone to such lengths as to be past all bearing, I was not in the house. I have made up my mind not to attempt any cure of the political situation without powerful protection, . . . I come now to a subject which, perhaps, ought to have been my first. How glad I was to get your letter from Britain! I was afraid of the ocean, afraid of the coast of the island. The other parts of the enterprise I do not underrate; but yet they inspire more hope than fear, and it is the suspense rather than any positive alarm that makes me uneasy. You, however, I can see, have a splendid subject for description, topography, natural features of things and places, manners, races, battles! your commander himself—what themes for your pen! I will gladly, as you request, assist you in the points you mention, and will send you the verses you ask for, that is, 'An owl to Athens.'¹ But, look you! I think you are keeping me in the dark. Tell me, my dear brother, what Caesar thinks of my verses. For he wrote before to tell me he had read my first book. Of the first part, he said that he had never read anything better even in Greek; the rest, up to a particular passage, somewhat 'careless'—that is his word. Tell me the truth—is it the subject-matter or the 'style' that he does not like? You needn't be afraid. I shall not admire myself one whit the less. On this subject speak like a lover of truth, and with your usual brotherly frankness.

¹ Cf. p. 323 (Caesar's account of the punishment of Quintus by the British).

¹ 'Sending coals to Newcastle'

(Ad Q. F., ii. 15, tr. E. S. Shuckburgh.)

In 51 B. C. Cicero, much against his will, was sent out to govern the province of Cilicia, in S.E. Asia Minor, and remained there for a year. His predecessor, Appius Claudius, had grossly misgoverned the province: Cicero's administration was a model of justice and self-restraint. Among his correspondents was Marcus Caelius Rufus, a brilliant and dissipated young man of fashion, now serving the office of Aedile at Rome. In this letter—witty, slangy, and shrewd—Caelius sums up the political situation in February 50 B. C.: Caesar's ten years' governorship in Gaul is drawing to its close, and the signs of the times are already pointing to the final breach between Caesar and Pompey which resulted in the Civil War in 49.

I HAVE no doubt the news has reached you of Appius being impeached by Dolabella. But there is by no means the feeling against him which I had expected. For the truth is, Appius acted with a good deal of sense. No sooner did Dolabella appear at the tribunal, than he entered the city and gave up his demand for a triumph. By thus acting he at once took the edge off popular talk, and showed himself also to be better prepared than his accuser had expected. His chief hope is now in you. I know you don't dislike him. It is now in your power to attach him to you as strongly as you choose. If you had never had a quarrel with him, you would now have had a freer hand in the whole business: as it is, if you push legality to the proverbial extreme, you must be on your guard against being thought not to have been quite candid and sincere in renouncing your hostility. In this respect you will certainly be on safe ground in doing him a favour, if so minded; for no one will say that you have been debarred from doing a duty by the influence of intimacy and friendship. . . . Pompey is said to be very anxious on Appius's behalf, so much so that it is even thought that he means to send one or other of his sons to you. Here we are all for his acquittal, and, by Hercules, every disclosure that could reflect disgrace or dishonour on him has been carefully barred. Our consuls are indeed energetic—they haven't been able to get a single decree through the Senate except the one for the Latin festival! Our friend Curio's tribunate is deadly dull—as cold as ice. In short I can hardly express to you the flatness of everything at Rome. If it had not been for a good fight I am having with the shopkeepers and water companies a lethargy would have settled upon the State. If the Parthians don't make it warm for you we here are stiff with cold. However Bibulus¹ has done his best without the help of the Parthians he has managed to lose a poor cohort or two in Amanus. So it is reported here.

I said just now that Curio was much in the cold—well he is now getting warm! for he is being pulled to pieces with a hot fire of criticism. For just because he did not get his way about intercalation he has with the most outrageous levity rattled to the popular party and begun speaking up for Caesar and has made a great parade of a road law not much unlike Rullus's agrarian law and another about the sale of provisions which enacts that the aediles should measure goods. He had not done this when I wrote the first part of my letter. Pray if you render any assistance to Appius let me have some of the credit. It will be a disgrace to you if I have no Greek panthers.²

(Ad Fam. viii 6 tr. Shuckburgh.)

This letter written just after the outbreak of the Civil War in January 49 B.C. shows Cicero as husband and father.

TULLIUS to his wife and her father to his dearest daughter and Cicero³ to his mother and sister send warm greetings. I think my darlings you should carefully consider and reconsider what to do whether to stay at Rome or to join me or seek some place of safety. This is not a point for my consideration alone but for yours also. What occurs to me is this—you may be safe at Rome under Dolabella's¹ protection, and that circumstance may prove serviceable to us in case of any violence or plunder commencing. But, on the other hand, I am shaken in this idea by seeing that all the loyalists have left Rome and have the ladies of their families with them. Again, the district in which I am now consists of towns and estates also which are in my power, so you could be a good deal with me, and, if you quitted me, could very conveniently stay in domains belonging to us. I cannot as yet quite make up my mind which of the two is the better course for you to take. Please observe for yourselves what other ladies of your rank are doing, and be careful not to be cut off from the power of leaving town when you do wish to do so. I would have you carefully consider it again and again with each other and with your friends. Tell Philotimus to secure the house with barricades and a watch. Also please organize a regular service of letter-carriers, so that I may hear something from you every day. Above all attend to your health, if you wish me to maintain mine.

¹ Bibulus was now governor of Syria the next province to Cilicia.

² Caelius wanted Cicero to send him panthers from his province Cilicia for the public games which he as Aedile had to provide.

³ Young Marcus Cicero's son.

(Ad Fam. xiv. 18, tr. Shuckburgh.)

The following short letter, written by Caesar to Cicero in March 49, gives us an interesting side-light upon the personality of Caesar.

THOUGH I have only had a glimpse of our friend Furnius, and have not yet been able conveniently to speak to him or hear what he has to say, being in a hurry and on the march, yet I could not neglect the opportunity of writing to you and sending him to convey my thanks. Be sure I have often thanked you and I expect to have occasion to do so still more often in the future : so great are your services to me. First I beg you, since I trust that I shall quickly reach Rome, to let me see you there, and employ your advice, favour, position and help of all kinds. I will return to what I began with : pardon my haste and the shortness of my letter. All the other information you may get from Furnius.

(Ad Att. ix. 6a, tr. Winstedt.)

¹ Dolabella, a supporter of Caesar, was now the husband of Cicero's daughter, Tullia.

In December of 45 B.C. Caesar paid a visit to Cicero at his villa at Puteoli (near Naples). This famous letter to Atticus gives a spirited account of a rather alarming ordeal.

TO think that my formidable guest leaves no regret behind! For indeed it passed off splendidly. However, when he reached Philippus on the evening of the 18th, the house was so full of soldiers that there was hardly a room left for Caesar himself to dine in. Two thousand men if you please! I was much disturbed as to what was going to happen the next day; and Cassius Barba came to the rescue and gave me guards. A camp was pitched in the fields, and the house put under guard. On the 19th he stayed with Philippus till one o'clock and admitted no one at his accounts, I believe, with Balbus. Then he walked on the shore. After two he took his bath. Then he heard about Mamurra without changing countenance. He was anointed and sat down to dinner. He was undergoing a course of emetics, so he ate and drank at his pleasure without fear. It was a lordly dinner, and well served, and not only that, but

'Well cooked, and seasoned, and, the truth to tell,
With pleasant discourse all went very well.'

Besides his chosen circle were entertained very liberally in three rooms and freedmen of lower degree and slaves could not complain of stint. The upper sort were entertained in style. In fact I was somebody. Still he was not the sort of guest to whom one would say 'Be sure to look me up on the way back.' Once is enough. There was no serious talk, but plenty of literary. In a word he was pleased and enjoyed himself. He said he would spend one day at Puteoli and another near Baiae.

There you have all about my entertainment, or billeting you might say, objectionable, as I have said, but not uncomfortable. I am staying here a while and then go to Tusculum. As he passed Dolabella's house, and nowhere else, the whole troop formed up on the right and left of him. So Nicias tells me.

(Ad Att. xiii 52, tr. Winstedt.)

Although in the majority of the letters politics form the main topic, Cicero continually reveals his interest in philosophy, literature, and the general life of his day. The next letter, to Papirius Paetus, is marked by the half-melancholy facetiousness assumed by Cicero during the distasteful years of Caesar's dictatorship :

I WAS doubly charmed by your letter, first because it made me laugh myself, and secondly because I saw that you could still laugh. Nor did I in the least object to being overwhelmed with your shafts of ridicule, as though I were a light skirmisher in the war of wits. What I am vexed at is that I have not been able, as I had intended, to run over to see you : for you would have had not a mere guest but a brother-in-arms. And such a hero ! not the man whom you used to do for by the hors-d'œuvre. I now bring an unimpaired appetite to the egg, and so the fight is maintained right up to the roast veal. The compliments you used to pay me in old times—'What a contented person !' 'What an easy guest to entertain !'—are things of the past. All my anxiety about the good of the State, all meditating of speeches to be delivered in the Senate, all getting up of briefs I have cast to the winds. I have thrown myself into the camp of my old enemy Epicurus—not, however, with a view to the extravagance of the present day, but to that refined splendour of yours—I mean your old style when you had money to spend (though you never had more landed estate). Therefore prepare ! You have to deal with a man who not only has a large appetite, but who also knows a thing or two. You are aware of the extravagance of your bourgeois gentilhomme. You must forget all your little baskets and your omelettes. I am now so advanced in the art that I frequently venture to ask your friend Verrius and Camillus to dinner—what dandies ! how fastidious ! But think of my audacity : I even gave Hirtius a dinner, without a peacock however. In that dinner my cook could imitate him in everything but the hot sauce.

So this is my way of life nowadays ; in the morning I receive not only a large number of 'loyalists', who, however, look gloomy enough but also our exultant conquerors here who in my case are quite prodigal in polite and affectionate attentions. When the stream of morning callers has ebbed, I wrap myself up in my books either writing or reading. There are also some visitors who listen to my discourses under the belief of my being a man of learning because I am a trifle more learned than themselves. After that all my time is given to my bodily comfort. I have mourned for my country more deeply and longer than any mother for her only son. But take care if you love me to keep your health lest I should take advantage of your being laid up to eat you out of house and home. For I am resolved not to spare you even when you are ill.

(Ad Fam ix 20 tr Shuckburgh.)

Although Cicero professed to be delighted at the assassination of Caesar there were others who held that his removal had only made confusion worse confounded. Among these was Gaius Matius who sent this frank and manly apologia to Cicero in August 44.

I RECEIVED great pleasure from your letter because I found that your opinion of me was what I had hoped and wished it to be not that I was in any doubt about it but for the very reason that I valued it so highly I was most anxious that it should remain unimpaired. Conscious however that I had done nothing which could give offence to the feelings of any good citizen I was naturally the less inclined to believe that you adorned as you are with so many excellences of the most admirable kind could have allowed yourself to be convinced of anything on mere idle report particularly seeing that you were a friend for whom my spontaneous attachment had been and still was unbroken. And knowing now that it has been as I hoped I will answer those attacks which you have often opposed on my behalf as was fairly to be expected from your well known generosity and the friendship existing between us.

For I am well aware of all they have been heaping on me since Caesar's death. They make it a reproach against me that I go heavily for the loss of a friend, and think it cruel that one whom I loved should have fallen, because, say they, country must be put before friends—as though they have hitherto been successful in proving that his death really was the gain of the commonwealth. But I will not enter any subtle plea; I admit that I have not attained to your higher grades of philosophy: for I have neither been a partisan of Caesar in our civil dissensions—though I did not abandon my friend even when his action was a stumbling-block to me—nor did I ever give my approval to the Civil War, or even to the actual ground of quarrel, of which indeed I earnestly desired that the first sparks should be trampled out. And so in the triumph of a personal friend I was never ensnared by the charms either of place or of money; prizes which have been recklessly abused by the rest, though they had less influence with him than I had. I may even say that my own property was impaired by that act of Caesar, thanks to which many of those who are rejoicing at Caesar's death continued to live in their own country. That our defeated fellow-countrymen should be spared was as much an object to me as my own safety. Is it possible then for me, who wanted all to be left uninjured, not to feel indignation that he by whom this was secured is dead? above all when the very same men were the cause at once of his unpopularity and his untimely end? You shall smart then, say they, since you dare to disapprove of our deed. What unheard-of insolence! One man then may boast of a deed which another is not even allowed to lament without punishment. Why, even slaves have always been free of this—to feel their fears, their joys, their sorrows as their own, and not at anybody else's dictation; and these are the very things which now, at least according to what your 'liberators' have always in their mouths, they are trying to wrest from us by terrorism. But they try in vain. There is no danger which has terrors enough ever to make me desert the side of gratitude or humanity; for never have I thought that death in a good cause is to be shunned, often indeed that it deserves to be courted. But why are they inclined to be enraged with me if my wishes are simply that they may come to regret their deed, desiring as I do that Caesar's death may be felt to be untimely by us all? It is my duty as a citizen to desire the preservation of the constitution? Well, unless both my life in the past and all my hopes for the future prove without any words of mine that I do earnestly desire this I make no demand to prove it by my professions.

To you therefore I make a specially earnest appeal to let facts come before assertions, and to take my word for it that, if you feel that honesty is the best policy, it is impossible I should have any association with lawless villains. Or can you believe that the principles I pursued in the days of my youth, when even error could pass with some excuse, I shall renounce now that I am going down the hill, and with my own hands unravel all the web of my life? That I will not do, nor yet will I commit any act that could give offence, beyond the fact that I do lament the sad fall of one who was to me the dearest friend and the most illustrious of men. But were I otherwise disposed, I would never deny what I was doing, lest it should be thought I was at once shameless in doing wrong, and false and cowardly in dissembling it.

But then I undertook the management of those games which Caesar's heir celebrated for Caesar's victory? Well, this is a matter which belongs to one's private obligations, not to any political arrangement—it was however in the first place a tribute of respect which I was called upon to pay to the memory and the eminent position of a man whom I dearly loved, even though he was dead, and also one that I could not refuse at the request of a young man so thoroughly promising, and so worthy in every way of Caesar as he is.

Again, I have frequently paid visits of compliment to the consul Antonius. And you will find that the very men who think me but a lukewarm patriot are constantly going to his house in crowds, actually for the purpose of soliciting or carrying away some favour. But what a monstrous claim it is, that while Caesar never laid any such embargo as this to prevent me from associating freely with anybody I pleased—even if they were people whom he personally did not like—these men who have robbed me of my friend should attempt by malicious insinuations to prevent my showing a kindness to whomsoever I will !

I have however no fear that the moderation of my life will hereafter prove an insufficient defence against false insinuations, and that even those who do not love me, because of my loyalty to Caesar, would not rather have their own friends imitate me than themselves. Such of life as remains to me, at least if I succeed in what I desire, I shall spend in quiet at Rhodes ; but if I find that some chance has put a stop to this I shall simply live at Rome as one who is always desirous that right should be done.

I am deeply grateful to our good friend Trebatius for having thus disclosed to me your sincere and friendly feeling, and given me even an additional reason for honouring and paying respect to one whom it has always been a pleasure to me to regard as a friend. Farewell heartily, and let me have your esteem.

(Ad Fam. xi. 28, tr. G. E. Jeans.)

A letter from young Marcus, Cicero's son, to his father's confidential secretary, Tiro, may form a fitting conclusion to these extracts. In 44 B. C. young Cicero was a student at Athens, one of the chief 'University' towns of the time, and it is clear enough that his manner of life there was not as exemplary as a fond parent might have wished. The letter is a curious mixture of naïveté and guile, and no doubt it has had a thousand counterparts in every age—not excluding the present. Though but a shadow of his father, young Cicero was not utterly worthless, and the Emperor Augustus paid him the honour due to his name, by taking him as his colleague in the consulship of 30 B. C.

AFTER I had been anxiously expecting letter-carriers day after day, at length they arrived forty-six days after they left you. Their arrival was most welcome to me : for while I took the greatest possible pleasure in the letter of the kindest and most beloved of fathers, still your most delightful letter put a finishing stroke to my joy. So I no longer repent of having suspended writing for a time, but am rather rejoiced at it ;

Autobiographical details are often interspersed among general reflexions, as in this passage from the Second Book :

At Rome I had my schooling, and was taught
 Achilles' wrath, and all the woes it brought ;
 At classic Athens, where I went ere long,
 I learnt to draw the line 'twixt right and wrong,
 And search for truth, if so she might be seen,
 In academic groves of blissful green ;
 But soon the stress of civil strife removed
 My adolescence from the scenes it loved,
 And ranged me with a force that could not stand
 Before the might of Caesar's conquering hand.
 Then when Philippi turned me all adrift
 A poor plucked fledgeling, for myself to shift,
 Bereft of property, impaired in purse,
 Sheer penury drove me into scribbling verse :
 But now, when times are altered, having got Enough, thank heaven, at least to boil my pot,
 I were the veriest madman if I chose
 To write a poem rather than to doze.

(Epistles ii. 2, 41-54, tr. Conington.)

LUCIUS ANNAEUS SENECA,¹ one of the most prolific of Roman writers, is the most characteristic figure of the age of Claudius and Nero, and will always be associated with the latter, as the tutor and adviser of his earlier years. Born in Spain, he shows little sign of a provincial origin in his writings, which range from tragedies to natural history, and his pointed, epigrammatical style, with its wealth of rhetorical figures and the subtle tricks of expression, is perhaps the best example of what is termed ' Silver Latin '—the Latin of Imperial times. The Moral Epistles were composed in the later years of Seneca's life, when he had retired from his public career, conscious that he was no longer capable of restraining the fantastic propensities of the young emperor. Though all addressed to Lucilius, these letters are frankly general in their appeal, and are more like sermons than anything else in classical Roman literature. Written from the point of view of the

¹ See pp. 181 ff., 299 ff., 476 ff., 487.

Stoic philosophy, they inculcate moral lessons on such subjects as the Terrors of Death, Philosophy and Riches, Progress, Virtue, the Supreme Good, the evils of Drunkenness, the Happy Life, and their value was recognized from early times by the Christian writers who found in them much that was entirely in sympathy with their own moral beliefs. In the Middle Ages, Seneca's reputation stood as high as Cicero's, and Dante, Chaucer, Petrarch, all owed him a debt.

The following letter, describing an experience in travelling through the tunnel which formed a short cut between Naples and the fashionable seaside resort of Baiae, is most characteristic of Seneca's method :

WHEN it was time for me to return to Naples from Baiae, I easily persuaded myself that a storm was raging, that I might avoid another trip by sea, and yet the road was so deep in mud, all the way, that I may be thought none the less to have made a voyage. On that day I had to endure the full fate of an athlete, the anointing with which we began was followed by the sand sprinkle in the Naples tunnel. No place could be longer than that prison, nothing could be dimmer than those torches, which enabled us, not to see amid the darkness, but to see the darkness. But, even supposing that there was light in the place, the dust, which is an oppressive and disagreeable thing even in the open air, would destroy the light, how much worse the dust is there, where it rolls back upon itself, and, being shut in without ventilation, blows back in the faces of those who set it going! So we endured two inconveniences at the same time, and they were diametrically different. We struggled both with mud and with dust on the same road and on the same day.

The gloom, however, furnished me with some food for thought, I felt a certain mental thrill, and a transformation unaccompanied by fear, due to the novelty and the unpleasantness of an unusual occurrence. Of course I am not speaking to you of myself at this point, because I am far from being a perfect person, or even a man of middling qualities. I refer to one over whom fortune has lost her control. Even such a man's mind will be smitten with a thrill and he will change colour. For there are certain emotions, my dear Lucilius, which no courage can avoid ; nature reminds courage how perishable a thing it is. And so he will contract his brow when the prospect is forbidding, will shudder at sudden apparitions, and will become dizzy when he stands at the edge of a high precipice and looks down. This is not fear ; it is a natural feeling which reason cannot rout. That is why certain brave men, most willing to shed their own blood, cannot bear to see the blood of others. Some persons collapse and faint at the sight of a freshly inflicted wound ; others are affected similarly on handling or viewing an old wound which is festering. And others meet the sword-stroke more readily than they see it dealt.

Accordingly, as I said, I experienced a certain transformation, though it could not be called confusion. Then at the first glimpse of restored daylight my good spirits returned without forethought or command. And I began to muse and think how foolish we are to fear certain objects to a greater or less degree, since all of them end in the same way. For what difference does it make whether a watch-tower or a mountain crashes down upon us ? No difference at all, you will find. Nevertheless, there will be some men who fear the latter mishap to a greater degree, though both accidents are equally deadly ; so true it is that fear looks not to the effect, but to the cause of the effect. Do you suppose that I am now referring to the Stoics, who hold that the soul of a man crushed by a great weight cannot abide, and is scattered forthwith, because it has not had a free opportunity to depart ? That is not what I am doing ; those who think thus are, in my opinion, wrong. Just as fire cannot be crushed out, since it will escape round the edges of the body which overwhelms it ; just as the air cannot be damaged by lashes and blows, or even cut into, but flows back about the object to which it gives place ; similarly the soul, which consists of the subtlest particles, cannot be arrested or destroyed inside the body, but, by virtue of its delicate substance, it will rather escape through the very object by which it is being crushed Just as lightning, no matter how widely it strikes and flashes, makes its return through a narrow opening so the soul, which is still subtler than fire, has a way of escape through any part of the body We therefore come to this question whether the soul can be immortal But be sure of this if the soul survives the body after the body is crushed the soul can in no wise be crushed out, precisely because it does not perish, for the rule of immortality never admits of exceptions and nothing can harm that which is everlasting Farewell

(Epistle lvi, tr R M Gummere)

Another extract may be taken from a letter written in praise of the simple life

MY friend Maximus and I have been spending a most happy period of two days taking with us very few slaves—one carriage load—and no paraphernalia except what we wore on our persons The mattress lies on the ground and I upon the mattress There are two rugs—one to spread beneath us and one to cover us Nothing could have been subtracted from our luncheon, it took not more than an hour to prepare, and we were nowhere without dried figs never without writing tablets If I have bread, I use figs as a relish, if not, I regard figs as a substitute for bread Hence they bring me a New Year feast every day, and I make the New Year happy and prosperous by good thoughts and greatness of soul for the soul is never greater than when it has laid aside all extraneous things, and has secured peace for itself by fearing nothing and riches by craving no riches The vehicle in which I have taken my seat is a farmer's cart Only by walking do the mules show that they are alive The driver is barefoot, and not because it is summer either I can scarcely force myself to wish that others shall think this cart mine My false embarrassment about the truth still holds out you see, and whenever we meet a more sumptuous party I blush in spite of myself—proof that this conduct which I approve and applaud has not yet gained a firm and steadfast dwelling place within me He who blushes at riding in a rattle-trap will boast when he rides in style.

So my progress is still insufficient. I have not yet the courage openly to acknowledge my thriftiness. Even yet I am bothered by what other travellers think of me. But instead of this I should really have uttered an opinion counter to that in which mankind believe, saying, 'You are mad, you are misled, your admiration devotes itself to superfluous things! You estimate no man at his real worth. When property is concerned, you reckon up in this way with most scrupulous calculation those to whom you shall lend either money or benefits; for by now you enter benefits also as payments in your ledger. You say: "His estates are wide, but his debts are large." "He has a fine house, but he has built it on borrowed capital." "No man will display a more brilliant retinue on short notice, but he cannot meet his debts." "If he pays off his creditors, he will have nothing left."' So you will feel bound to do in all other cases as well,—to find out by elimination the amount of every man's actual possessions.

I suppose you call a man rich just because his gold plate goes with him even on his travels, because he farms land in all the provinces, because he unrolls a large account-book, because he owns estates near the city so great that men would grudge his holding them in the waste lands of Apulia. But after you have mentioned all these facts, he is poor. And why? He is in debt. 'To what extent?' you ask. For all that he has. Or perchance you think it matters whether one has borrowed from another man or from Fortune. What good is there in mules caparisoned in uniform livery? Or in decorated chariots and

Steeds decked with purple and with tapestry,
With golden harness hanging from their necks,
Champing their yellow bits, all clothed in gold?

Neither master nor mule is improved by such trappings.

(Epistle lxxxvii, §§ 2-8, tr. Gummere.)

while, that I may strike while the iron is hot, I send this letter, like an avant-courrier, to request a favour of you, which I mean shortly to ask in person. But before I inform you what my request is I must let you into the occasion of it.

Being lately at my native place, a young lad, son to one of my fellow-townsmen, made me a visit. 'Do you go to school?' I asked him. 'Yes,' said he. 'And where?' He told me, 'At Milan.' 'And why not here?' 'Because' (said his father, who was present, and had in fact brought the boy with him) 'we have no teachers.' 'How is that?' said I; 'surely it nearly concerns you who are fathers' (and very opportunely several of the company were so) 'that your sons should receive their education here, rather than anywhere else. For where can they be placed more agreeably than in their own country, or maintained in more modest habits and at less expense, than at home and under the eye of their parents? Upon what very easy terms might you, by a general contribution, procure teachers, if you would only apply towards raising a salary for them what you now spend on your son's lodging, journeys, and whatever a man has to pay for when abroad (which means, paying for everything). Why, I, who have as yet no children myself, am ready to give a third part of any sum you shall think proper to raise for this purpose, for the benefit of our Commonwealth, whom I regard as a daughter or a parent. I would take upon myself the whole expense, were I not apprehensive that my benefaction might hereafter be abused and perverted to private ends; as I have observed to be the case in several places where teachers are engaged by the local authorities. The single means to prevent this mischief is, to leave the choice of the professors entirely in the breast of the parents, who will be so much the more careful to determine properly as they shall be obliged to share the expense of maintaining them. For though they may be careless in disposing of another's bounty, they will certainly be cautious how they apply their own; and will see that none but those who deserve it shall receive my money, when they must at the same time receive theirs too. Let my example then encourage you to unite heartily in this design , and be assured the greater the sum my share shall amount to the more agreeable it will be to me You can undertake nothing more advantageous to your children nor more acceptable to your country They will by this means receive their education where they receive their birth and be accustomed from their infancy to inhabit and affect their native soil May you be able to procure professors of such distinguished abilities that the neighbouring towns shall be glad to draw their learning from hence and as you now send your children to foreigners for education may foreigners hereafter flock thither for their instruction

I thought proper thus to lay open to you the rise of this affair that you might be the more sensible how agreeable it will be to me if you undertake the office I request I entreat you therefore with all the earnestness a matter of so much importance deserves to look out amongst the great numbers of men of letters which the reputation of your genius brings to you teachers to whom we may apply for this purpose but it must be understood that I cannot make a binding agreement with any of them For I would leave it entirely free to the parents to judge and choose as they shall see proper all the share I pretend to claim is that of contributing my care and my money If therefore any one shall be found who relies upon his own talents he may repair thither but under the proviso that the said reliance is all he can count upon so far as I am concerned Farewell

(Book IV 13 to William Melmoth A D 1746)

Pliny is fond of describing natural scenery and in this extract from a letter to Domitius Apollinaris he gives a picture of the surroundings of his Tuscan country house which for minuteness of detail and accuracy of delineation has few rivals in Roman literature

THE kind concern you expressed when you heard of my design to pass the summer at my villa in Tuscany and your obliging endeavours to dissuade me from going to a place which you think unhealthy are extremely agreeable to me I

THE method you have pursued, my dear Pliny, in sifting the cases of those denounced to you as Christians is extremely proper. It is not possible to lay down any general rule which can be applied as the fixed standard in all cases of this nature. No search should be made for these people, when they are denounced and found guilty they must be punished, with the restriction, however, that when the party denies himself to be a Christian, and shall give proof that he is not (that is, by adoring our Gods), he shall be pardoned on the ground of repentance, even though he may have formerly incurred suspicion. Informations without the accuser's name subscribed must not be admitted in evidence against any one, as it is introducing a very dangerous precedent, and by no means agreeable to the spirit of the age

(x 96 97, tr Melmoth)

Finally we will take an extract from the correspondence of MARCUS AURELIUS Emperor from A D 161-180, more famous for his Greek 'Meditations', and his tutor Marcus Cornelius Fronto, whose reputation as an orator and man of letters was pre eminent in the second century. The correspondence was rediscovered early in the nineteenth century, and is unfortunately somewhat disjointed and fragmentary. The following letter was written by Marcus Aurelius about A D 144 before his accession.

HAIL, most reverend master,

We are well. By a satisfactory arrangement of meals I worked from three o'clock a m till eight. For the next hour I paced about in slippers most contentedly before my bedroom. Then putting on my boots and donning my cloak—for we had been told to come in that dress—I went off to pay my respects to my Lord.¹

We set out for the chase and did doughty deeds. We did hear say that boars had been bagged for we were not lucky enough to see any. However we climbed quite a steep hill, then in the afternoon we came home. I to my books so taking off my boots and doffing my dress, I passed nearly two hours on my couch, reading Cato's speech 'On the property of Pulchra', and another in which he impeached a tribune. 'Ho,' you cry to your boy, 'go as fast as you can and fetch me those speeches from the libraries of Apollo!' It is no use your sending, for those volumes, among others, have followed me here. So you must get round the librarian of Tiberius's library: a little douceur will be necessary, in which he and I can go shares when I come back to town. Well, these speeches read, I wrote a little wretched stuff, fit to be dedicated to the deities of water and fire: truly to-day I have been unlucky in my writing, the lucubration of a sportsman or a vintager, such as those whose catches ring through my bedroom, a noise every whit as hateful and wearisome as that of the law-courts. What is this I have said? Nay, 'tis true, for my master is an orator.

¹ The Emperor Antoninus Pius. M Aurelius was his adopted son and successor.

I think I must have taken a chill, whether from walking about in slippers in the early morning, or from writing badly, I know not. I only know that, rheumy enough at all times, I seem to be more drivelling than ever to-day. So I will pour the oil on my head and go off to sleep, for not a drop of it do I intend to pour into my lamp to-day, so tired am I with riding and sneezing. Farewell for my sake, dearest and sweetest of masters, whom I would make bold to say I long to see more than Rome itself.

(tr. C. R. Haines.)

LITERARY CRITICISM

LITERARY criticism is necessarily a late birth of the literary spirit. It implies on the one hand the accumulation of a considerable body of literature so that the critic may first formulate and then test his rules, on the other it requires the growth of what may be termed a literary self-consciousness, prompting in men's minds the question 'Why and how does an author write?', not merely 'What does he say to us?' The literary history of Greece furnishes an interesting example of the advance which literature must make before general questions about the art of writing are raised or investigated. In Greece, from quite early times, the Homeric poems were constantly studied and quoted yet, until the time of Aristotle (384-322 B.C.), there is little to show that any one had seriously tried to discover the secret of their power and influence. Criticism was content to confine itself to questions of matter and to ignore those of style. Homer, in Plato's phrase,¹ was the 'educator of Greece'. He was Bible and Encyclopedia in one. Besides being a store-house of examples for moral instruction he was expected, somewhat unreasonably, to supply exact information on technical subjects, such as war and the arts and crafts. Naturally inaccuracies and inconsistencies were easy to detect, with the result that he was accused of 'lying'—a favourite charge against the poets. Later on in the fifth century B.C. the growing interest in philosophy and the study of language led to further criticisms. Some censured Homer's theology while his defenders endeavoured to explain away the difficulties by means of allegory. Others questioned his use of certain words and expressions. Here similarly the defence would reply either with a new interpretation or with emendation of the text. Such was the discussion which played in earlier times around the Homeric poems. Of literary criticism there is as yet little or nothing though the fact that Homer continued to be studied as an educational text-book shows that his supremacy was appreciated however uncritically. Plato indeed found himself reluctantly obliged to exclude Homer from his ideal State, chiefly on the ground that Homer and his fellow poets were mere 'imitators' and 'told lies' about the gods. On the other hand we hear of Alcibiades boxing the ears of a schoolmaster, who on being asked for a text of Homer replied that he had none. The first really critical appreciation of Homer was left to Plato's pupil, Aristotle. Deducing his rules from the extant body of Greek literature, he adopted his master's term Mimesis (= 'imitation')—in the altered sense of 'representation' and not of mere slavish 'copying'. He notes that Poetry and the other fine arts are alike in resting on a common principle of 'imitation', but differ according to the means, manner, and objects of the imitation. In Poetry the means are rhythm, language, and harmony, the objects of imitation are persons in action, and the manner may be narrative, dramatic, or, as in Homer, a combination of both.¹ On this foundation Aristotle builds up the first systematic exposition of the art of poetry which we possess. The Poetics,² as this treatise is called, is in its present form only a fragment of the whole work, and, as it stands, deals principally with Tragedy. Aristotle was the first to lay it down that poetry should be judged from an aesthetic rather than a moral standpoint. He was also the first critic to grasp the nature of 'poetic truth'. The poet, he says, deals with universals, the historian with particular facts; so that Poetry is 'more philosophical' than History.

¹ Plato, Republic 606 E

In the sphere of poetry Aristotle supplied a fresh equipment to criticism. In his Rhetoric he clarified previous thought on the subject of prose (i. e. oratorical) literature. Defining rhetoric as the 'art of persuasion', he makes a close analysis of human motives, character, and feelings, and of the arguments best adapted to influence each. Aristotle's critical studies in literature were continued by his successor, Theophrastus (372–287 B. C.), who wrote both on prose and on poetry. To him is attributed the division of style into the 'grand', the 'intermediate', and the 'plain', a distinction adopted later by many of the Roman writers, including Cicero.

With the beginning of the third century B. C. we pass to the Age of Scholarship. At Alexandria and, later, at Pergamum in Asia Minor, important libraries were founded and developed. Both became busy centres of learning. 'Scholarship' is an accurate term to apply to the studies of these two schools.

¹ i. e. Homer speaks at times in his own person, at times through the mouth of one of his characters.

² See Bywater's Translation, Clarendon Press, 1920. 'Aristotle, On the Art of Poetry.'

They were principally occupied with the preparation of commentaries on the classical writers the study of grammar and textual criticism. Their main contribution to literary criticism was the compilation associated especially with the names of Aristophanes of Byzantium (257-180 B C) and Aristarchus (c 216-143 B C) heads in succession of the school at Alexandria of canons or carefully selected lists of standard authors grouped according to their subject matter. Homer is at the head of the Epic poets Demosthenes leads the orators Thucydides the historians. The canons were chiefly valuable because being drawn up with some discrimination they stereotyped in the schools the study of the best rather than the worst authors and thus assisted to preserve the best the order of merit which they assign to individual authors is of lighter consequence.

Both these schools came into direct contact with Rome and had an important influence upon Latin literary development. It was due to Crates of Mallos¹ that the study of Grammar was first introduced into Rome (c 168 B C). While there on a mission from the king of Pergamum he fell by accident into an open sewer and broke his leg. During his convalescence he amused himself by giving lectures to an enthusiastic audience. They dealt with the subject of Grammar a term used in a wide sense and embracing the exercise of literary appreciation (especially that of poetry) as well as the study of formal grammar. The impulse given to the pursuit of scholarship at Rome made itself felt in various directions. A few fragments survive of the Didascalica written by L. Accius the tragic poet (170-c 86 B C)². It gave a brief history in verse of Greek and Latin Poetry special prominence being allotted to the drama³. His views on this and other subjects including orthography were adversely criticized by C. Lucilius (180-c 102 B C)⁴ the satirist whose fragmentary remains touch on many points of critical and grammatical interest. They probably reflect the discussions of the Scipionic circle to which he belonged. Scipio Africanus the younger and his friend Laelius were its leading members. A detached reference to the late development of Roman poetry attributed to PORCIUS LICINIUS⁵ (fl 90

Cf Suetonius de Grammaticis § 2

¹ See pp 178 ff

See Merry Selected Fragments of Roman Poetry, pp 143-4

See pp 281 ff

⁴ or Licinius

applied himself to sifting the genuine plays from the mass of compositions then attributed to Plautus.¹ In this task he had to some extent been anticipated by Accius.² Stilo in his turn was to be followed by his more famous pupil, M. TERENTIUS VARRO³ (116-27 B.C.)⁴ The 'most learned of the Romans', as Quintilian calls him, just as to Cicero he was 'the most accurate of our antiquarians'. Varro took all knowledge for his province. He is quoted as saying before he was eighty, that he had already written nearly 500 books and the total may well have reached 600 before his death. Of this prodigious output we have only fragments. The treatise on Farming and part of his 'Latin Language' which dealt principally with etymology and grammar, alone survive complete. While he was mostly concerned with the accumulation of knowledge he shows a considerable interest in criticism. His works On Poets, On Poems &c., are lost. But his satires contain many literary references. He was especially interested in Roman Comedy. He remarks that Caecilius deserves first place for his plots, Terence for his character-drawing and Plautus for his dialogue. In another passage he notes that Titinius, Terence, Atta exhibit 'truth to character' while Trabea, Atilius, Caecilius have special skill in 'exciting the emotions'. It is worth while to compare these criticisms with the canon of Sedigitus quoted above. Elsewhere Varro recognizes Theophrastus's threefold division of the styles, taking Pacuvius as a type of the grand, Lucius of the 'plain' and Terence of the intermediate. If we are justified as probably we are, in taking these observations as typical of Varro's critical power, he was sensible rather than profound. Roman critics generally liked to clothe their subjects on a ready-to-wear system. Varro's categories perhaps come from the peg but on the whole they fit.

If Varro was Rome's most learned writer, Stilo's other pupil M. TULLIUS CICERO (106-43 B.C.)⁵ was unquestionably her greatest man of letters. Orator, letter writing, rhetoric.

¹ Whom he greatly admired. He is said to have remarked that 'had the Muses wished to speak in Latin they would have spoken in the language of Plautus'.
² See Merry op. cit. p. 145.

³ Varro pronounced twenty-one plays to be the undoubted work of Plautus. It is generally supposed that the twenty plays which have come down to us represent Varro's selection.

⁴ See pp. 285 ff. 306 ff.

⁵ See pp. 93, 304 ff. 444 ff. 466 ff. 492 f.

B. C.), and forming perhaps part of a history of Latin Literature, written in not very poetical verse, may be quoted :

'Mid the second Punic warfare did the Muse with pinioned flight
Visit Romulus' rude people, who in battle take delight.¹

To the same period belongs the versified canon of Latin Comic Poets which is the compilation of VOLCATIUS SEDIGITUS (fl. c. 100 B. C.).² The style in which it is written reminds one of the doggerel often seen in country churchyards.

WHY is't our critics hesitate to say
Which poet owns Thalia's ³ proudest bay?
I utter sentence mid this erring throng :

Accept my canon—or be in the wrong !
Caecilius first, first prize to him I yield :
Plautus is next and leads the laggard field.
Third burning Naevius : if fourth we need,
Fourth place to thee, Licinius, I cede.
Atilius fifth, sixth Terence will I rate,
Turpilius seventh : Trabea makes eight.
Ninth Lanuvinus, tenth and last behold
Old Ennius added—great in being old !

Of the comic poets mentioned, with the exception of Terence and Plautus, we have little knowledge and scanty remains. Caecilius, though commended by other Roman writers, seems to stand too high in the 'order of merit'. Terence certainly should be ranked higher than sixth. In any event, a critic is not a judge 'placing' the competitors in a flat-race. Sedigitus misconceived the objects and principles of the Alexandrine scholars in drawing up their lists. The real significance of Alexandrine methods was more surely grasped by the grammarian L. Aelius Stilo (c. 154-74 B. C.), friend of Lucilius and tutor of Varro and Cicero. Aristarchus, the Alexandrine scholar, whose name by Horace's time had come to signify all that was acute in criticism, had subjected the text of Homer to a critical recension, clearing away spurious and interpolated passages. Stilo similarly philosophy, poetry even—there was no branch of Latin Literature on which he did not leave his mark. He himself describes his enthusiasm for literature in his speech on behalf of the Greek poet Archias, whose right to Roman citizenship had been contested. After a short technical defence of Archias's claim, he enlarges upon the utility of literature both to the individual and to the State. 'I owe my success and my courage', he says, 'to the example of old writers. Yet I am prepared to defend literature on other than utilitarian grounds.'

¹ Tr. J. Wight Duff, A Literary History of Rome, p. 119. See Merry, op. cit., p. 174.

² See Merry, op. cit., p. 176.

³ The Muse of Comedy.

EVEN if we could not point to results so valuable as these, if it were merely enjoyment that was sought in such pursuits, still, I take it, you would consider a recreation like this humane and liberal. Other enjoyments are not suited to all seasons, all times of life, all places; the study of literature stimulates us in boyhood, delights us in old age, is an ornament in prosperity, a comfort and a refuge in adversity, a joy at home, no hindrance abroad; it helps us through a sleepless night, it goes with us on our travels and is our companion in the country.
(pro Archia, 7. 15.)

In his youth Cicero himself had translated the Astronomica of the Alexandrine poet Aratus into hexameters which, if of no great merit, had at any rate revealed some of the technical possibilities of Latin metre.¹ But his writings, ardent and expert as he was in the cause of literature, contain disappointingly little in the way of poetical criticism—a few scattered morsels. The most interesting of them is a reference, in a letter to his brother Quintus, to the recently published poem of Lucretius. 'The poems of Lucretius', he writes, 'are, as you say—full of flashes of genius, yet full of art.' From other passages it is clear that Cicero went back on his early flirtations with Alexandrinism and wooed a native love in the shape of the old poets Ennius, Pacuvius, and Accius, many of whose fragments owe their survival to Cicero's quotation. He has a special regard for Ennius. He praises him for the 'tenderness, sensibility, and moral earnestness' of his verses on Cassandra, and exclaims, 'Ah! what a noble poet is Ennius, despised though he be by our chanters of Euphorion.' Elsewhere, he sends Atticus a verse parodying while another of a quite opposite character is preferred by those who are better qualified to give their judgement ? ' ' You have started a very pertinent question,' said I, ' but, perhaps the public at large will not approve my answer to it ' ' And what concern need that give you,' replied Atticus, ' if it meets the approbation of Brutus ? ' ' Very true, said I, ' for I had rather my sentiments on the qualifications of an orator should please you and Brutus, than all the world besides but as to my eloquence, I should wish this to please every one For he who speaks in such a manner as to please the people must inevitably receive the approbation of the learned As to the truth and propriety of what I hear, I am indeed to judge of this for myself, as well as I am able but the general merit of an orator must and will be decided by the effects which his eloquence produces For (in my opinion at least) there are three things which an orator should be able to effect, viz to inform his hearers, to please them and to move their passions By what qualities in the speaker each of these effects may be produced, or by what deficiencies they are either lost or but imperfectly performed is an inquiry which none but an artist can resolve, but whether an audience is really so affected by an orator as shall best answer his purpose must be left to their own feelings and the decision of the public. The learned therefore, and the people at large have never disagreed about who was a good orator and who was otherwise

¹ Lucretius pays them the sincere compliment of careful imitation.

' For do you suppose that, while the speakers mentioned above were in being they had not the same degree of reputation among the learned as among the populace ? If you had inquired of one of the latter, who was the most eloquent man in the city, he might have hesitated whether to say Antonius or Crassus, or this man perhaps would have mentioned the one, and that the other But would any one have given the preference to Philippus, though otherwise a smooth, a sensible, and a facetious speaker ? —that Philippus whom we, who form our judgement upon these matters by rules of art have decided to have been the next in for the uncouth vigour of the older poets. We may surmise from his own record as a prose-critic that he could sympathize with their strivings after artistic perfection.

As a critic Cicero's main strength and interest lie in his exposition of the principles of oratorical prose, in the practice of which he was an acknowledged master. In his early days, with characteristic industry,¹ he had cultivated his powers by the production of rhetorical text-books. These, however, were technical works. To his later years we owe the treatment of the subject on broader lines in the De Oratore (55 B. C.), and in the Brutus and the Orator, written some ten years after.² At the time of Cicero's entry upon public life oratory at Rome had already reached a high degree of perfection. Some critics even thought that its best days were already over. Its practitioners were arrayed in two conflicting schools of thought, the Attic which preferred a severely plain and condensed style and the Asiatic which favoured a florid and elaborate one.³ Cicero was inclined at first to follow the Asiatics, but gradually he evolved a style somewhere between the two which he himself calls Attic, denying this title to the so-called Atticists who, he thinks, forget that the Attic orators used ornament and rhythm as well as plainness of diction. He protests that oratory must appeal to the many as well as the few, and that this is the real test of the great orator.

BUT wherefore', interrupted Atticus, 'do you say, "in your own opinion, and in that of the public at large"? In deciding the merits of an orator, does the opinion of the vulgar, think you, always coincide with that of the learned? Or rather, does not one receive the approbation of the populace,

¹ 'I never let a single day go by without some exercise in oratory,' he says of his early life. Brutus, 309.

² The De Oratore is didactic in tone and deals with the education of an orator, his diction and delivery. The Orator is an essay on the ideal orator. The Brutus sketches the progress of Roman oratory down to Cicero's own day and contains a masterly series of brief judgements on the various orators of Rome.

³ The Atticists claimed to base their style on that of the older and simpler orators of Athens. The Asiatics followed the later rhetoricians who developed the rhetoric of Isocrates into an ornate style: this development seems to have taken place in the Roman province of Asia. In Cicero's day Hortensius represented Asianism, Calvus, the 'modern' poet and an orator as well, Atticism.

the ornament ('the flowers of language and thought') should rather be concentrated on certain points, so that these may 'stand out with the brilliancy of gems'.¹

Cicero for all his insistence on the popular appeal of great oratory, lacked nothing in appreciation of one uncompromising exponent of the austere style. In one of those concentrated five-line essays in criticism,² recording his judgement on his contemporaries, he pays an unqualified tribute to the spare Atticism of Caesar.³

TO the purest elegance of expression (which is equally necessary to every well bred citizen as to an orator) Caesar has added all the various ornaments of style so that he seems to exhibit the finest painting in the most advantageous point of view. As he has such extraordinary merit even in the tenor of his language, I must confess that there is no person I know of to whom he should yield the preference. Besides his manner of speaking both as to his voice and gesture is splendid and noble, without the least appearance of artifice or affectation, and there is a dignity in his very presence which bespeaks a great and elevated mind. 'Indeed' said Brutus, 'his orations please me highly', for I have had the satisfaction to read several of them. He has likewise written some *Commentaries*⁴ or short memoirs of his own transactions. 'And such' said I as merit the highest approbation for they are plain, correct and graceful and divested of all the ornaments of language so as to appear (if I may be allowed the expression) in a kind of undress. But while he pretended only to furnish the loose materials for such as might be inclined to compose a regular history he may, perhaps have gratified the vanity of a few literary *friseurs*⁵ but he has certainly prevented all sensible

Contrast the views of Petronius p. 378. ¹ Contained in the Brutus.

² Caesar himself took a keen interest in critical questions. He was the author of a lost treatise on Grammar from which survives the memorable advice: avoid an unprecedented or unfamiliar word as you would a rock at sea. He admired Terence for the purity of his style.

³ See pp. 392 ff.

⁴ i.e. those silly writers who will needs be fizzling up his exploits with the curling tongs! Wight Duff op cit p. 408.

merit? Nobody would, I am certain. For it is the invariable prerogative of an accomplished orator to be reckoned such in the opinion of the people. Though Antigenidas, therefore, the musician, might say to his scholar, who was but coldly received by the public, Play on, please me and the Muses; I shall say to my friend Brutus, when he mounts the rostra, as he frequently does, Play to me and the people; that those who hear him may be sensible of the effect of his eloquence, while I can likewise amuse myself with remarking the causes which produce it. When a citizen hears an able orator, he readily credits what is said; he imagines everything to be true, he believes and relishes the force of it; and, in short, the persuasive language of the speaker wins his absolute, his hearty assent. You, who are possessed of a critical knowledge of the art, what more will you require? The listening multitude is charmed and captivated by the force of his eloquence, and feels a pleasure which is not to be resisted. What here can you find to censure? The whole audience is either flushed with joy or overwhelmed with grief; it smiles or weeps, it loves or hates, it scorns or envies, and, in short, is alternately seized with the various emotions of pity, shame, remorse, resentment, wonder, hope, and fear, according as it is influenced by the language, the sentiments, and the delivery of the speaker. In this case, what necessity is there to await the sanction of a critic? For here, whatever is approved by the feelings of the people must be equally so by men of taste and erudition; and, in this instance of public decision, there can be no disagreement between the opinion of the vulgar and that of the learned.

(Brutus, 183, tr. Watson.)

From this it follows that a great style should combine all the elements of excellence, 'such an excellence', he explains, 'as is most adapted to interest the audience, yet such as will not only delight, but delight without satiety'.¹ Cicero insists that mere uninterrupted display, whether in prose or in poetry, soon palls:

¹ De Oratore iii, 96 ff.

the ornament ('the flowers of language and thought') should rather be concentrated on certain points so that these may stand out with the brilliance of gems¹

Cicero for all his insistence on the popular appeal of great oratory lacked nothing in appreciation of one uncompromising exponent of the austerer style. In one of those concentrated five-line essays in criticism² recording his judgement on his contemporaries he pays an unqualified tribute to the spare Atticism of Caesar³

TO the purest elegance of expression (which is equally necessary to every well bred citizen as to an orator) Caesar has added all the various ornaments of style so that he seems to exhibit the finest painting in the most advantageous point of view. As he has such extraordinary merit even in the tenor of his language I must confess that there is no person I know of to whom he should yield the preference. Besides his manner of speaking both as to his voice and gesture is splendid and noble without the least appearance of artifice or affectation, and there is a dignity in his very presence which bespeaks a great and elevated mind. 'Indeed said Brutus' his orations please me highly, for I have had the satisfaction to read several of them. He has likewise written some *Commentaries*⁴ or short memoirs of his own transactions. 'And such' said I as merit the highest approbation, for they are plain correct and graceful and divested of all the ornaments of language so as to appear (if I may be allowed the expression) in a kind of undress. But while he pretended only to furnish the loose materials for such as might be inclined to compose a regular history he may perhaps have gratified the vanity of a few literary *friseurs*⁵ but he has certainly prevented all sensible

Contrast the views of Petronius p. 378 ¹ Contained in the Brutus

² Caesar himself took a keen interest in critical questions. He was the author of a lost treatise on Grammar from which survives the memorable advice 'avoid an unprecedented or unfamiliar word as you would a rock at sea.' He admired Terence for the purity of his style.

³ See pp. 392 ff.

⁴ i. e. those silly writers who will needs be frizzling up his exploits with the curling tongs! Wight Duff op cit p. 408 men from attempting any improvement on his plan. For, in history, nothing is more pleasing than a correct and elegant brevity of expression.'

(Brutus, 261, tr. Watson.)

This last sentence leads to some consideration of Cicero's views on History, after which we may take our leave of him. In one of Cicero's works Atticus is represented as urging Cicero to 'adorn the country which he has already saved' by writing her history. The earlier Roman historians, he says, are rough and ready, careless and dull, and their writings are such as scarcely deserve the title of history. 'For History, as you also agree, is a task which more than any other requires rhetorical treatment, and so is just suited to your powers.' This view—that history is the province of oratory—is the complement of that expressed in the De Oratore, namely, that the study of history is part of the business of the orator, an opinion shared, as will subsequently be shown, by Quintilian.¹ To us the notion of 'rhetorical treatment' suggests an incongruity—how, we wonder, can rhetoric be consistent with a dispassionate presentation of the facts? All that can be said is that here Cicero is neither behind nor ahead of the judgement of his age. History since the time of the Greek historians, Ephorus and Theopompus, the pupils of Isocrates, had been regarded as a field for rhetorical display. Even their predecessor, Thucydides, most philosophical of ancient historians, shows more than traces of rhetorical influence. Oratory, in Cicero's eyes, embraces the whole field of knowledge and education, and therefore inevitably includes history. The general recognition of this doctrine in classical times may be inferred from the fact that Livy's History of Rome, in spite of its defects, was never really superseded.²

Literary criticism in Q. HORATIUS FLACCUS (65–8 B.C.)³ is first found in his Satires, where though admitting his obligations to Lucilius he is not afraid to censure him for his inconsequence and want of care for literary form.⁴ For his own Satires he expressly disclaims the title of poetry in words interesting both as a piece of typical self-scrutiny and because they give the key of much of his later criticism.

¹ See p. 380.

² See the remarks on Livy, p. 404.

⁴ See p. 288.

³ See pp. 69 ff., 166, 288 ff., 335 ff.

FIRST, be it understood, I make no claim
 To rank with those who bear a poet's name :
 'Tis not enough to turn out lines complete,
 Each with its proper quantum of five feet,
 Colloquial verse a man may write like me,
 But (trust an author) 'tis not poetry.
 No ; keep that name for genius, for a soul
 Of Heaven's own fire, for words that grandly roll.
 Hence some have questioned if the Muse we call
 The Comic Muse be really one at a :
 Her subject ne'er aspires, her style ne'er glows,
 And, save that she talks metre, she talks prose
 ' Ay but the angry father shakes the stage,
 When on his graceless son he pours his rage ' . . .
 Well, could Pomponius' sire to life return,
 Think you he'd rate his son in tones less stern ?
 So then 'tis not sufficient to combine
 Well-chosen words in a well-ordered line,
 When, take away the rhythm, the self-same words
 Would suit an angry father off the boards.
 Strip what I write, or what Lucilius wrote,
 Of cadence and succession, time and note,
 Reverse the order, put those words behind
 That went before, no poetry you'll find
 But break up this, '*When battle's brazen door
 Blood bolttered Discord from its fastenings tore,*'¹
 'Tis Orpheus mangled by the Maenads still
 The bard remains, unlimb him as you will

(Sat 1 4, 39-62, tr. Conington)

Poetry to Horace is a specialized and exclusive craft, requiring special talent and an infinitude of care. Just as Cicero's picture of the ideal orator is an elaborate piece of self-portraiture, so is Horace expounding the theory of which he himself is the supreme practitioner. His fundamental precepts are amplified in the Letter to the Pisos,¹ written some ten or fifteen years later. Long known by the misleading title—which would doubtless have drawn a smile from the author—of The Art of Poetry, this work has never ceased to influence literary thought, noticeably in England from the time of Spenser and Jonson downwards, and, most of all, in the early eighteenth century. It is no formal treatise, but a collection of aphorisms, often commonplace but always perfect in expression and practical in outlook. 'The labour of the file' (said of the conscientious artist), 'The mountain labours and the mouse is born' (of the pretentious writer of epic), 'Homer nodding', 'The purple patch'—these and many other instances show how admirably Horace conforms to Pope's definition of 'wit':

¹ A line from Canis

'What oft was thought, but ne'er so well expressed.'

This 'painstaking felicity'² of expression is not, however, Horace's only merit. Practical hints abound, limited in view perhaps, but always full of shrewd sense. 'Listen to the voice of criticism—your own and others', 'Be slow to publish, quick to destroy'

('What's kept at home you cancel by a stroke: What's sent abroad you never can revoke'), above all, 'study consistency, proportion, order,' 'avoid extremes'—these are characteristic maxims. 'They have still their value, and were particularly suited to an age when there were so many aspirants to literary fame, and when flattery was often made a substitute for candid criticism.'³

Selection from so quotable a work is a difficult task. The choice of the two passages which follow is due to their historical interest. In the first Horace recommends a return to the Greeks, the inventors and perfecters of all types of Drama,⁴ Rome's carelessness alone has prevented her from rivalling the Greeks in literature as in arms.

¹ Based upon an essay on poetry by one Neoptolemus of Parium, an Alexandrian writer of uncertain date. It is odd that Horace should go to Neoptolemus in preference to Aristotle's Poetics, yet not more so than that Cicero's philosophical essays should be based on the successors of Plato and Aristotle and not on the masters themselves.

² See p. 378.

³ D'Alton, Horace and His Age, p. 254.

⁴ Notice that Horace here, as often in the treatise, is concerned particularly with the Drama (cf. pp. 185-6).

MY friends make Greece your model when you write
 And turn her volumes over day and night
 But Plautus pleased our sires the good old folks
 They praised his numbers and they praised his jokes
 They did twas mighty tolerant in them
 To praise where wisdom would perhaps condemn
 That is if you and I and our compeers
 Can trust our tastes our fingers and our ears
 Know polished wit from horse play and can tell
 What verses do and what do not run well

After a brief sketch of the progress of Tragedy and Comedy in Greece he continues

OUR poets have tried all things nor do they Deserve least praise who follow their own way
 And tell in comedy or history piece
 Some story of home-growth not drawn from Greece
 Nor would the land we love be now more strong
 In warrior's prowess than in poet's song
 Did not her bards with one consent decline
 The tedious task to alter and refine
 Dear Pisos! as you prize old Numa's blood
 Set down that work and that alone as good
 Which blurred and blotted checked and counter-checked
 Has stood all tests and issued forth correct
 Because Democritus thinks fit to say
 That wretched art to genius must give way¹
 Stands at the gate of Helicon and guards
 Its precinct against all but crazy bards

¹ It is only fair to Horace to add his views on the relation of art and inspiration which occur later in the treatise

But here occurs a question some men start
 If good verse comes from nature or from art
 For me I cannot see how native wit
 Can ever dispense with art or art without it
 Set them to pull together they're agreed
 And each supplies what each is found to need

(Ars Poet. 408 ff. tr. Conington)

Our wittlings keep long nails and untrimmed hair,
 Much in brown studies, in the bath-room rare.
 For things are come to this ; the merest dunce,
 So but he choose, may start up bard at once,
 Whose head, too hot for hellebore ¹ to cool,
 Was ne'er submitted to a barber's tool.
 What ails me now, to dose myself each spring ?
 Else had I been a very swan to sing.
 Well, never mind : mine be the whetstone's lot,
 Which makes steel sharp, though cut itself will not.
 Although no writer, I may yet impart
 To writing folk the precepts of their art,
 Whence come its stores, what trains and forms a bard,
 And how a work is made, and how 'tis marred.

(Ars Poet., 261 ff., tr. Conington.)

We may observe in this 'return to the Greeks' a divergence from the principles of his immediate predecessors. Here as elsewhere Horace shows little sympathy with the older Roman poets whom in early youth he had been obliged to study under the eye and rod of his master Orbilius 'the flogger'. It is their artlessness which he most deploras. In this dislike a Varro or a Cicero could hardly have shared, though the Alexandrines would have supported him in his plea for careful workmanship, and with this side of Alexandrinism Horace would have been in full accord. His advice to a would-be poet to keep his lay locked up 'for full nine years' has indeed been thought to contain a direct reference to Cinna's Zmyrna.² Where he parts company with the 'moderns' is in commending the broad and healthy spirit of classical Greek literature as a better pattern for imitation than the pedantic dilettantism of Alexandria.

Horace is evidently in conflict with current criticism in another passage dealing with 'poetic diction'.

IN words again be cautious and select,
 And duly pick out this, and that reject.
 High praise and honour to the bard is due
 Whose dexterous setting makes an old word new.

¹ The ancient cure for madness.

² See p. 359.

Nay more, should some recondite subject need
 Fresh signs to make it clear to those who read
 A power of issuing terms till now unused
 If claimed with modesty is ne'er refused
 New words will find acceptance if they flow
 Forth from the Greek with just a twist or so
 But why should Rome capriciously forbid
 Our bards from doing what their fathers did ?
 Or why should Plautus and Cæcilius gain
 What Virgil or what Varius asks in vain ?
 Nay I myself if with my scanty wit
 I coin a word or two why grudge me it
 When Ennius and old Cato boldly flung
 Their terms broadcast and amplified our tongue ?
 To utter words stamped current by the mill
 Has always been thought right and always will
 When forests shed their foliage at the fall
 The earliest born still drops the first of all
 So fades the elder race of words and so
 The younger generations bloom and grow

(Arts Poet 46 ff tr Conington)

It is known that the Augustans—the poets at any rate—deliberately cultivated a literary language from which all vulgar words were excluded. Diminutives and compound words—at all times a feature of the spoken language and the source of much of the peculiar charm found in Catullus's poetry in a previous generation—have scarcely a place in Horace or Virgil. Horace again though avoiding the uncompromising purism of a Julius Caesar insists on usage as being the only sound canon for the choice of words. New words and compounds may be admitted but only if analogy especially Greek analogy supports them. Virgil during and after his life was pursued as Homer had been by a host of petty detractors who found particular fault with his innovations. Such innovations were Graecisms both of grammar and vocabulary and the use of old words in new senses a supposed fault which even his friend

Our wittlings keep long nails and untrimmed hair,
 Much in brown studies, in the bath-room rare.
 For things are come to this; the merest dunce,
 So but he choose, may start up bard at once,
 Whose head, too hot for hellebore¹ to cool,
 Was ne'er submitted to a barber's tool.
 What ails me now, to dose myself each spring?
 Else had I been a very swan to sing.
 Well, never mind: mine be the whetstone's lot,
 Which makes steel sharp, though cut itself will not.
 Although no writer, I may yet impart
 To writing folk the precepts of their art,
 Whence come its stores, what trains and forms a bard,
 And how a work is made, and how 'tis marred.
 (Ars Poet., 261 ff., tr. Conington.)

We may observe in this 'return to the Greeks' a divergence from the principles of his immediate predecessors. Here as elsewhere Horace shows little sympathy with the older Roman poets whom in early youth he had been obliged to study under the eye and rod of his master Orbilius 'the flogger'. It is their artlessness which he most deploras. In this dislike a Varro or a Cicero could hardly have shared, though the Alexandrines would have supported him in his plea for careful workmanship, and with this side of Alexandrinism Horace would have been in full accord. His advice to a would-be poet to keep his lay locked up 'for full nine years' has indeed been thought to contain a direct reference to Cinna's Zmyrna.² Where he parts company with the 'moderns' is in commending the broad and healthy spirit of classical Greek literature as a better pattern for imitation than the pedantic dilettantism of Alexandria.

Horace is evidently in conflict with current criticism in another passage dealing with 'poetic diction'.

IN words again be cautious and select,
 And duly pick out this, and that reject.
 High praise and honour to the bard is due
 Whose dexterous setting makes an old word new.

¹ The ancient cure for madness.

² See p. 359.

Nay more, should some recondite subject need
 Fresh signs to make it clear to those who read,
 A power of issuing terms till now unused
 If claimed with modesty is ne'er refused
 New words will find acceptance if they flow
 Forth from the Greek with just a twist or so
 But why should Rome capriciously forbid
 Our bards from doing what their fathers did?
 Or why should Plautus and Caecilius gain
 What Virgil or what Varius asks in vain?
 Nay I myself if with my scanty wit
 I coin a word or two why grudge me it
 When Ennius and old Cato boldly flung
 Their terms broadcast and amplified our tongue?
 To utter words stamped current by the mill
 Has always been thought right and always will
 When forests shed their foliage at the fall,
 The earliest born still drops the first of all
 So fades the elder race of words and so
 The younger generations bloom and grow

(Ars Poet. 46 ff. tr. Conington.)

It is known that the Augustans—the poets at any rate—deliberately cultivated a literary language from which all vulgar words were excluded. Diminutives and compound words—at all times a feature of the spoken language and the source of much of the peculiar charm found in Catullus's poetry in a previous generation—have scarcely a place in Horace or Virgil. Horace again though avoiding the uncompromising purism of a Julius Caesar insists on usage as being the only sound canon for the choice of words. New words and compounds may be admitted but only if analogy especially Greek analogy supports them. Virgil during and after his life was pursued as Homer had been by a host of petty detractors who found particular fault with his innovations. Such innovations were Graecisms both of grammar and vocabulary and the use of old words in new senses a supposed fault which even his friend

I'm dubbed Alcaeus, and retire in force :
 And who is he ? Callimachus of course :
 Or, if 'tis not enough, I bid him rise
 Mimnermus,¹ and he swells to twice his size.
 Writing myself, I'm tortured to appease
 Those wasp-like creatures, our poetic bees :
 But when my pen's laid down, my sense restored,
 I rest from boring, rest from being bored.

(Ep. ii. 2. 87-105.)

Of the lines next quoted a competent critic² says that they 'are not only as admirable practical advice on the cultivation of style as any ever given, but explain the secret of Horace's own ease in writing'. Even those who censure Horace for his 'golden mediocrity' and his want of deep feeling admit the essential charm and beauty which invest his picture of the ideal Latin poet.

BAD poets are our jest : yet they delight,
 Just like their betters, in whate'er they write,
 Hug their fool's paradise, and, if you're slack
 To give them praise, themselves supply the lack.
 But he who meditates a work of art,
 Oft as he writes, will act the censor's part :
 Is there a word wants nobleness and grace,
 Devoid of weight, unworthy of high place ?
 He bids it go, though stiffly it decline,
 And cling and cling, like suppliant to a shrine :
 Choice terms, long hidden from the general view,
 He brings to day and dignifies anew,
 Which, once on Cato's and Cethegus' lips,
 Now pale their light and suffer dim eclipse ;
 New phrases, in the world of books unknown,
 So use but father them, he makes his own :
 Fluent and limpid, like a crystal stream,
 He makes Rome's soil with genial produce teem.

(Ep. ii. 2. 105-121, tr. Conington.)

Of Colophon, a Greek elegiac poet of the time of Solon.
 W. Y. Sellar, Horace and the Elegiac Poets, p. 110.

The intolerance or bias shown in Horace's (and Cicero's) judgments upon Roman poets has no place in the literary surveys found more than once in the poems of P. OVIDIUS NASO (43 B. C.-17 A. D.)¹ They abound in generous eulogy, sometimes more generous than discriminating.² Ovid's habit is to sum up each poet's qualities in a concise epithet. Ennius is

Supreme in genius, unrefined in art

Callimachus, conversely, has 'art' without 'genius'. Doubtless some epithets are conventional or superficial. Yet Ovid recognizes—as few of his contemporaries seem to have done—the sublime element in Lucretius's poetry:

Poet sublime, thy song shall ever sound

Till one day's havoc all the earth confound.

The decline in post-Augustan times of both oratory and poetry is a commonplace. What is less familiar is the fact that some at any rate of the Roman writers soon realized and sought to account for it. The first of these is C. VELLEIUS PATERCULUS (c. 19 B. C.-31 A. D.),³ who interposes in his outline of history three literary passages⁴ one of which attempts to explain the decline as due to a natural law of rise and fall.⁵

I CANNOT resist the temptation to state here a problem which I have often pondered, without ever succeeding in clearing it up. Can we sufficiently express the strangeness of the fact that in each branch (of literature or art) the leading intellects have taken the same cast and foregathered in the same brief period? The period of a human life—and no long one either—saw tragedy become brilliant through men of more than mortal genius, Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides; another such period did the same for the Old Comedy, under the hands of Cratinus, Aristophanes, and Eupolis. Menander, with Philemon and Diphilus (as close to him in workmanship as they were in date), produced the New Comedy and left it perfect

¹ See pp. 123 ff., 153 ff., 242 ff.

² He is as ready to prophesy immortality for e. g. Aratus, the meteorological poet of Alexandria as for Homer.

³ See pp. 414 ff.

⁴ The other two are conventional lists in the manner of the grammarians and less sensible than some, e. g. in a list of Augustan poets Horace does not appear, while Virgil is bracketed with a poetaster, Rabirius.

⁵ The excellent translation quoted is from Prof. W. C. Summers, The Silver Age of Latin Literature, pp. 145-6.

beyond all possibility of imitation, all within the space of a very few years. The philosophers again, whose stream descends from the lips of Socrates, and whose names I enumerated just now, how long after the death of Plato and Aristotle did they flourish? What great name is there in eloquence before Isocrates or after his pupils and theirs? So narrow the period here that every one that merits mention might have seen or been seen by his fellows.

And this holds good for Rome as much as Greece. Unless you go back to rough, tyro performances, praiseworthy only as pioneer work, Roman tragedy means Accius and his contemporaries, and the brilliant period of the pleasant humour of Latin comedy was due to Caecilius, Terence, and Afranius—all of about the same age. So with the historians: reckon Livy to the age preceding ours, and (apart from Cato and some early and little-known writers) they are the outcome of barely eighty years—and the productive period of poetry goes back no earlier and comes down no later. As for the eloquence of statesman or barrister, the perfect form of prose expression, I maintain, with apologies to Crassus, Scipio, Laelius, the Gracchi, Fannius, and Galba, that, leaving Cato again out of the reckoning, the time of general efflorescence is that of its chief representative Cicero. Very few of his predecessors give pleasure, and there is not an orator who deserves respect but what either he may have seen Cicero or Cicero him. And any one who studies chronology will find the same thing applies to grammar, sculpture, and painting: the best period of each art is comprised within very narrow limits of time.

I often try to find reasons for this phenomenon . . . but find none in whose correctness I feel confidence, some that are perhaps probable, and, in particular, these. Emulation it is that encourages talent: sometimes envy, sometimes admiration, fires the desire to imitate. Now Nature ordains that that which is the object of the highest endeavour shall reach the highest level; perfection is not easily maintained, and it is the law of Nature that what cannot go forward must go back. At the outset we are hot to catch up those we reckon ahead of us, but, once we abandon hope of passing or equalling them with our hope dies our interest it ceases to aim at a goal it can never attain regards this particular province as now appropriated and looks round for a new one

The insight shown in the last paragraph is remarkable in a man who like Velleius has no claims to be considered a serious historian and was probably a better soldier than writer. But the cause to which he attributes the decline is only one of many, political and social as well as literary. Two further reasons (besides the undoubted fact—implied by Velleius—that the very perfection of the Augustan writers drove many of their successors in despair off the main roads of literature to seek at whatever cost any original effects that might be gathered in its by paths) will here be noticed. Both are literary and both are symptomatic of the new era.

The first is the introduction of public readings by the poets before a critical audience. The original object no doubt was to obtain friendly criticism of as yet unpublished work. When the practice first began we are uncertain. It is usually attributed to Asinius Pollio¹ (76 B.C.—5 A.D.) but there were literary salons and we may be sure semi-public readings before Pollio. Horace as early as 35 B.C. has a significant reference to the custom as something already well established.² The 'Recitations' grew more and more popular after the time of Augustus. In the younger Pliny's day (c. 61 A.D.—c. 113 A.D.) attendance at them had become a social duty of an almost intolerable character. As ever growing crowds of amateurs thronged the recitation halls independent criticism the original object of these gatherings was exchanged for an uncritical enthusiasm which became conventional. The effect on poetry of the Recitations was to give it a definitely rhetorical cast. Extravagances were introduced to secure an effect however momentary. Form was submerged in the diffuseness characteristic of Silver Latin Poetry and clearly rhetorical in its origin.³

Pollio was a patron of poets and the friend of Virgil. From the few scattered remarks attributed to him he was evidently a discerning and fearless critic. He detected plagiarism in Sallust inaccuracies in Caesar, and provincialisms in Livy. He founded the first public library in Rome.

¹ Cf. Horace Sat. I. iv. l. 23. Loath as I am in public to recite. And so ll. 71-2. Nor read I save to friends and that when pressed. Not to chance auditor or casual guest.

² Diffuseness is here said to be rhetorical on the principle that you have only to say a thing often enough to be believed. Virgil is diffuse—

Side by side with the Recitations went a more pervading and more pernicious influence in the vogue of 'Declamations',¹ or set speeches on prescribed themes, delivered in the schools of rhetoric. Rhetoric had for a long time been an important element in Roman education. Originally it had served much the same purpose as the debating clubs of our public schools and universities or the 'moot courts' sometimes held by legal societies. The young Roman learned how to get up a brief or to speak elegantly and fluently on a debating subject. He was often required to speak in the character of some personage, taken usually from history, and in this way received a vivid training of the imagination. The growing craze for novelty gradually caused the teachers of rhetoric to cast about for sensational themes, however divorced from the probabilities of human life, with a strong preference for those which afforded most scope for original treatment. Much misplaced ingenuity was devoted to these unreal discussions. In literature their consequences were an insincerity of treatment and a craving at all costs for point and paradox, culminating in the Epigrammatic or 'Pointed' style. Seneca among prose-writers and Lucan among poets are its typical exponents.

One aspect of the decadence—its insincerity—is touched on by A. PERSIUS FLACCUS (34-62 A. D.),² who devotes his first Satire to the subject.³

HOURLY we see some raw pin-feathered thing
 Attempt to mount, and Fights and Heroes sing ;
 Who for false quantities was whipt at School
 But t'other day, and breaking Grammar-rule ;
 Whose trivial Art was never try'd, above
 The bare description of a Native Grove :
 Who knows not how to praise the Country Store,
 The Feasts, the Baskets, nor the fatted Boar. . . .
 Some love to hear the Fustian Poet roar, he repeats and amplifies the simplest sentence in order to make his meaning perfectly clear—and he is therefore 'rhetorical' in this sense. But we do not call him a 'rhetorical' poet simply. There are other qualities in his poetry—qualities which later poets lacked. Of these sincerity is not the least.

¹ See also the section on Story-telling and the Novel, p. 246.

² See pp. 301 ff. ³ The translation is Dryden's free but lively version.

And some on Antiquated Authors pore
 Rummage for sense, and think those only good
 Who labour most, and least are understood
 Others, by foolish Ostentation led,
 When call'd before the Bar, to save their Head,
 Bring trifling Tropes, instead of solid Sense
 And mind their Figures more than their Defence
 Are pleas'd to hear their thick scull'd Judges cry
 Well mov'd oh finely said, and decently!
 Theft (says th' Accuser) to thy charge I lay,
 O Pedius What does gentle Pedius say?
 Studious to please the Genius of the Times
 With Periods Points, and Tropes he slurs his Crimes
 He Robbed not, but he Borrow'd from the Poor
 And took but with Intention to restore
 Effeminate Roman, shalt such Stuff prevail
 To tickle thee, and make thee wag thy Tail?

(Sat. i. 69-87, tr. Dryden)

To the other aspect of the decadence—its extravagances—frequent reference is made in the Satyricon of C. PETRONIUS (ob. A. D. 66).¹ He diagnoses acutely the literary disease from which the age was suffering, attributing it to the unwholesome diet of the rhetorical schools.² A passage, put into the mouth of a 'spouting' poet, Eumolpus, is a partly ironical description of contemporary practice. Lucan, in his Pharsalia,³ flouting the epic convention of 'divine interpositions', had dealt with the subject of the Civil War on more or less historical lines. To Eumolpus this is a deadly breach of Epic orthodoxy.⁴

YES, my young friends poetry has led many astray. As soon as a man has shaped his verse in feet and woven into it a more delicate meaning with an ingenious circumlocution, he thinks that forthwith he has scaled Helicon. In this fashion people who are tired out with forensic oratory often take refuge in the calm of poetry as in some happier haven, supposing that a poem is easier to construct than a declamation adorned with quivering epigrams. But nobler souls do not love such coxcombrs, and the mind cannot conceive or bring forth its fruit unless it is steeped in the vast flood of literature. One must flee away from all diction that is, so to speak, cheap, and choose words divorced from popular use, putting into practice, 'I hate the common herd and hold it afar.'¹ Besides, one must take care that the epigrams do not stand out from the body of the speech: they must shine with a brilliancy that is woven into the material.² Homer proves this, and the lyric poets, and Roman Virgil, and the studied felicity of Horace.³ The others either did not see the path that leads to poetry, or saw it and were afraid to walk in it. For instance, any one who attempts the vast theme of the Civil War will sink under the burden unless he is full of literature. It is not a question of recording real events in verse; historians can do that far better. The free spirit of genius must plunge headlong into allusions and divine interpositions, and rack itself for epigrams coloured by mythology, so that what results seems rather the prophecies of an inspired seer than the exactitude of a statement made on oath before witnesses.

¹ See pp. 257 ff.

² § 1. See p. 246. Compare also Tacitus Dialogus, c. 35 (quoted on p. 386). ³ See pp. 55 ff.

⁴ In the three hundred specimen lines which Eumolpus incontinentally proceeds to declaim we are offered a not very convincing demonstration of mythological treatment.

(Satyr. § 118, tr. Heseltine.)

Petronius's evidently sincere admiration for the classic tradition of Virgil and Horace has its counterpart a few years later in Quintilian's championship of Cicero in oratory. M. FABIANUS QUINTILIANUS⁴—to give him his Roman name—was the author of a work known as the Institutio Oratoria (or Education of an Orator), the most exhaustive treatise on the subject ever attempted. He lavished on it all the devout enthusiasm for his profession accumulated in his experience not only as a teacher

¹ Compare with this the Augustan theory of diction (p. 369). The quotation is—significantly—from Horace (Odes, iii. 1).

² Contrast with this view Cicero's remark on 'ornament' in prose and poetry (p. 363).

³ For this admirably terse criticism, compare the references to Horace both in this Section (pp. 364 ff.) and those on Lyric (pp. 69 ff.) and Satire (pp. 288 ff.).

⁴ His dates are A.D. c. 35-95.

of eloquence but as a busy practitioner in the courts. In the twelve books which make up the work he ranges with methodical rapture over every detail bearing the least relation to the education and training of an orator—from his early life and schooling and his declamatory exercises through all the practical details of pleading and the arrangement, style, and delivery of his speeches. The ideal reading for the nascent orator is discussed in Book x. In it Quintilian reviews Greek and Latin Literature and passes judgement in succession on the more important writers in either tongue. The standpoint from which he criticizes is illustrated in the following passage:

THEOPHRASTUS says that the reading of poets is of great service to the orator, and has rightly been followed in this view by many. For the poets will give us inspiration as regards the matter, sublimity of language, and the appropriate treatment of character, while minds that have become jaded owing to the daily wear and tear of the courts will find refreshment in such agreeable study. Consequently Cicero recommends the relaxation provided by the reading of poetry. We should, however, remember that the orator must not follow the poets in everything, more especially in their freedom of language and their licence in the use of figures. Poetry has been compared to the oratory of display, and further, aims solely at giving pleasure, which it seeks to secure by inventing what is not merely untrue, but sometimes even incredible. Further, we must bear in mind that it can be defended on the ground that it is tied by certain metrical necessities and consequently cannot always use straightforward and literal language, but is driven from the direct road to take refuge in certain by ways of expression, and compelled not to lengthen, contract, transpose or divide them, whereas the orator stands armed in the forefront of the battle, fights for a high stake and devotes all his effort to winning the victory. And yet I would not have his weapons defaced by mould and rust, but would have them shone with a splendour that shall strike terror to the heart of the foe, like the flashing steel that dazzles heart and eye at once, not like the gleam of gold or silver, which has no warlike efficacy and is even a positive peril to its wearer.

History,¹ also, may provide the orator with a nutriment which we may compare to some rich and pleasant juice. But when we read it we must remember that many of the excellences of the historian require to be shunned by the orator. For history has a certain affinity to poetry and may be regarded as a kind of prose poem, while it is written for the purpose of narrative, not of proof, and designed from beginning to end not for immediate effect or the instant necessities of forensic strife, but to record events for the benefit of posterity and to win glory for its author. Consequently, to avoid monotony of narrative, it employs unusual words and indulges in a freer use of figures. Therefore, as I have already said, the famous brevity of Sallust, than which nothing can be more pleasing to the leisured ear of the scholar, is a style to be avoided by the orator in view of the fact that his words are addressed to a judge who has his mind occupied by a number of thoughts and is also frequently uneducated, while, on the other hand, the milky fullness of Livy is hardly of a kind to instruct a listener who looks not for beauty of exposition, but for truth and credibility.

(Inst. Or. x. i. 27-32, tr. H. E. Butler.)

The 'famous brevity' of Sallust² and the 'milky fullness' of Livy are two of many neat characterizations. Quintilian's verdicts as a whole are happier when he is dealing with Latin authors than with Greek and with prose-writers than with poets. His limitations are largely inherent in the plan of his work. Admittedly his object is to suggest a course of study which may form style or the 'body of eloquence', a consideration often overlooked by those who find much of his criticism unoriginal, inadequate, or both. He often acknowledges that he is not stating an independent view of his own, and if he dismisses Lucretius as 'difficult'¹ and Catullus as 'a lampoonist' his characterizations of Horace, whose 'boldness in the choice of words is only equalled by his felicity', and of Ovid who might have risen to any heights 'had he been ready to curb his talents instead of indulging them', may be set beside his compact descriptions of Herodotus as 'pleasant, lucid, diffuse' and of Thucydides as 'close in texture, terse and ever eager to press forward'.

¹ Compare with Quintilian's remarks on History the views of Cicero (p. 364) and Pliny (pp. 387-9). The passages taken together give us a valuable insight into the theory and practice of Roman historical writing. Livy, whose work has often been described as a 'prose epic', furnishes a good example of the 'affinity of history to poetry'.

² He speaks elsewhere of his 'immortal rapidity'.

Two of his longer criticisms are reproduced below. That which follows immediately is an admirably expressed appreciation of one who was his chief, though not his only,² master—Cicero.

BUT it is our orators, above all who enable us to match our Roman eloquence against that of Greece. For I would set Cicero against any one of their orators without fear of refutation. I know well enough what a storm I shall raise by this assertion more especially since I do not propose for the moment to compare him with Demosthenes, for there would be no point in such a comparison, as I consider that Demosthenes should be the object of special study, and not merely studied, but even committed to memory. I regard the excellences of these two orators as being for the most part similar, that is to say, their judgement, their gift of arrangement, their methods of division, preparation and proof, as well as everything concerned with invention. In their actual style there is some difference. Demosthenes is more concentrated. Cicero more diffuse, Demosthenes makes his periods shorter than Cicero, and his weapon is the rapier, whereas Cicero's periods are longer, and at times he employs the bludgeon as well. Nothing can be taken from the former, nor added to the latter. The Greek reveals a more studied, the Roman a more natural art. As regards wit and the power of exciting pity, the two most powerful instruments where the feelings are concerned we have the advantage. Again, it is possible that Demosthenes was deprived by national custom of the opportunity of producing powerful perorations, but against this may be set the fact that the different character of the Latin language debars us from the attainment of those qualities which are so much admired by the adherents of the Attic school. As regards their letters, which have in both cases survived, and dialogues, which Demosthenes never attempted, there can be no comparison between the two. But, on the other hand, there is one point in which the Greek has undoubted superiority: he comes first in point of time, and it was largely due to him that Cicero was able to attain greatness. For it seems to me that Cicero, who devoted himself heart and soul to the imitation of the Greeks, succeeded in reproducing the force of Demosthenes, the copious flow of Plato, and the charm of Isocrates. But he did something more than reproduce the best elements in each of these authors by dint of careful study; it was to himself that he owed most of, or rather all his excellences, which spring from the extraordinary fertility of his immortal genius. For he does not, as Pindar says, 'collect the rain from heaven, but wells forth with living water,' since Providence at his birth conferred this special privilege upon him, that eloquence should make trial of all her powers in him. For who can instruct with greater thoroughness, or more deeply stir the emotions? Who has ever possessed such a gift of charm? He seems to obtain as a boon what in reality he extorts by force, and when he wrests the judge from the path of his own judgement the latter seems not to be swept away, but merely to follow. Further, there is such weight in all that he says that his audience feel ashamed to disagree with him, and the zeal of the advocate is so transfigured that it has the effect of the sworn evidence of a witness, or the verdict of a judge. And at the same time all these excellences, of which scarce one could be attained by the ordinary man even by the most concentrated effort, flow from him with every appearance of spontaneity, and his style, although no fairer has ever fallen on the ears of men, none the less displays the utmost felicity and ease. It was not, therefore, without good reason that his own contemporaries spoke of his 'sovereignty' at the bar, and that for posterity the name of Cicero has come to be regarded not as the name of a man but as the name of eloquence itself. Let us, therefore, fix our eyes on him, take him as our pattern, let the student realize that he has made real progress if he is a passionate admirer of Cicero

¹ Quintilian's contemporary the poet Statius speaks more happily of the 'soaring frenzy of learned Lucretius'.

² Cf. Quintilian x. 2. 24. It does not follow that because we should select one author for special imitation he should be our only model.

(Inst Or x i 105-12, tr Butler)

But loyalty to Cicero did not disable the critic. In the following estimate of Seneca Quintilian shows remarkable fairness towards a writer whose 'pointed style' represents a fashion in utter conflict with Quintilian's own precepts

I HAVE deliberately postponed the discussion of Seneca in connexion with the various departments of literature owing to the fact that there is a general though false impression that I condemn and even detest him. It is true that I had occasion to pass censure upon him when I was endeavouring to recall students from a depraved style, weakened by every kind of error, to a severer standard of taste. But at that time Seneca's works were in the hands of every young man, and my aim was not to ban his reading altogether, but to prevent his being preferred to authors superior to himself, but whom he was never tired of disparaging, for, being conscious of the fact that his own style was very different from theirs, he was afraid that he would fail to please those who admired them. But the young men loved rather than imitated him, and fell as far below him as he fell below the ancients. For I only wish they had equalled or at least approached his level. But he pleased them for his faults alone, and each individual sought to imitate such of those faults as lay within his capacity to reproduce and then brought a reproach on his master by boasting that he spoke in the genuine Senecan manner. Seneca had many excellent qualities, a quick and fertile intelligence with great industry and wide knowledge, though as regards the last quality he was often led into error by those to whom he had entrusted the task of investigating certain subjects on his behalf. He dealt with almost every department of knowledge; for speeches, poems, letters and dialogues all circulate under his name. In philosophy he showed a lack of critical power, but was none the less quite admirable in his denunciations of vice. His works contain a number of striking general reflexions and much that is worth reading for edification; but his style is for the most part corrupt and exceedingly dangerous, for the very reason that its vices are so many and attractive. One could wish that, while he relied on his own intelligence, he had allowed himself to be guided by the taste of others. For if he had only despised all unnatural expressions and had not been so passionately fond of all that was incorrect, if he had not felt such affection for all that was his own, and had not impaired the solidity of his matter by striving after epigrammatic brevity, he would have won the approval of the learned instead of the enthusiasm of boys. But even as it is, he deserves to be read by those whose powers have been formed and firmly moulded on the standards of a severer taste.

(Inst. Or. x. i. 125-31, tr. Butler.)

With Quintilian's criticism of Cicero may be compared another, found in the Dialogus of C. CORNELIUS TACITUS (A.D. c. 55-c. 117).¹ This is generally thought to be an early work of Tacitus, cast in a Ciceronian mould and differing so greatly in style from his other works as to have raised doubt whether he was really the author. Its main subject is the causes of the decline of oratory. Aper, who defends the 'modern' style, here asserts that the would-be old-fashioned orators of the day imitate Cicero's faults and mannerisms and ignore his real virtues.

I COME now to Cicero, who had the same battle to fight with his contemporaries that I have with you. While they admired the ancients, he gave the preference to the eloquence of his own day; and it is in taste more than anything else that he outdistances the orators of his period. Cicero was the first to give proper finish to oratorical style. He was the first to adopt a method of selection in the use of words and to cultivate artistic arrangement, further, he tried his hand at flowery passages, and was the author of some pointed sayings at any rate in the speeches which he wrote when well on in years and towards the close of his career, that is to say when his powers were well developed, and he had learned by experience and practice the qualities of the best type of oratory. As to his earlier speeches they are not free from the old fashioned blemishes. He is tedious in the introductions long winded in the narrative parts and wearisome in his digressions. He is slow to rouse himself, and seldom warms to his work, only here and there do you find a sentence that has a rhythmical cadence and a flash point at the finish. There is nothing you can extract nothing you can take away with you. It is just as in rough and ready construction work where the walls are strong in all conscience and lasting but lacking in polish and lustre. My own view is that the orator like a prosperous and well found householder, ought to live in a house that is not only wind and weather proof but pleasing also to the eye, he should not only have such furnishings as shall suffice for his essential needs but also number among his belongings both gold and precious stones so as to make people want to take him up again and again and gaze with admiration. Some things there are again that must be carefully avoided as antiquated and musty. There should be never a word of the rusty, mouldy tinge never a sentence put together in the lame and listless style of the chroniclers. The orator ought to avoid discreditable and senseless buffoonery, vary his arrangement and refrain from giving the self same cadence to all his period-endings.

¹ See pp. 417 ff., 499 ff.

I don't want to make fun of Cicero's 'Wheel of Fortune', and his Boar's Sauce,¹ and the tag *esse videatur*², which he tacks on as a pointless finish for every second sentence throughout his speeches. It has gone against the grain to say what I have said.

¹ The words may equally mean 'Verrine justice'. A pun perpetrated by Cicero in his first speech against Verres.

² Cicero's favourite clausula or rhythmical clause ending.

and there is more that I have left out: though it is precisely these blemishes, and these alone, that are admired and imitated by those who call themselves orators of the good old school.

(Dial. 22-3, tr. Peterson.)

Messalla, the champion of the older school, fails to meet Aper's point that the ample Ciceronian style is unsuited to modern conditions. He has, however, some interesting remarks on the decline. He sees moral causes at its root, and mainly the changed character of education.

BUT nowadays our boys are escorted to the schools of the so-called 'professors of rhetoric',—persons who came on the scene just before the time of Cicero but failed to find favour with our forefathers, as is obvious from the fact that the censors Crassus and Domitius ordered them to shut down what Cicero calls their 'school of shamelessness'. They are escorted, as I was saying, to these schools, of which it would be hard to say what is most prejudicial to their intellectual growth, the place itself, or their fellow-scholars, or the studies they pursue. The place has nothing about it that commands respect—no one enters it who is not as ignorant as the rest; there is no profit in the society of the scholars, since they are equally devoid of any feeling of responsibility whether they take the floor or provide an audience; and the exercises in which they engage largely defeat their own objects. You are of course aware that there are two kinds of subject-matter handled by these professors, the deliberative and the disputatious.¹ Now while, as regards the former, it is entrusted to mere boys, as being obviously of less importance and not making such demands on the judgement, the more mature scholars are asked to deal with the latter—but, good heavens! what poor quality is shown in their themes, and how unnaturally they are made up! Then in addition to the subject-matter that is so remote from real life, there is the bombastic style in which it is presented. And so it comes that themes like these: 'the reward of the king-killer', or 'the outraged maid's alternatives', or 'a remedy for the plague', or 'the incestuous mother', and all the other topics that are treated every day in the school, but seldom or never in actual practice, are set forth in magniloquent phraseology; but when the speaker comes before a real tribunal¹ ..

¹ Cf. note on p. 257.

(Diul 35, tr Peterson)

'No,' he continues, 'it may be said of eloquence as of a flame that it requires motion to excite it, fuel to feed it, and that it brightens as it burns'² Great eloquence requires a great theme and the genius to deal with it

Having sketched the conditions in which great oratory alone can flourish, Messalla is obliged to confess that they are not in themselves desirable 'The benefit derived from the eloquence of the Gracchi did not make up for what the country suffered from their laws, and too dearly did Cicero pay by the death he died for his renown in oratory' The fact was that 'the settled government of Augustus had caused a hush to fall upon eloquence as indeed it had upon the world at large' A similar hush, we might add, to that which the Augustan age of poetry had imposed upon its successors.

The Dialogus will always be read, both for the brilliance of its argument and expression and for the instructive picture which it gives us of literary thought towards the end of the first century. It would be possible to amplify it from the Letters of Tacitus's friend Pliny the Younger (C PLINIUS CAECILIUS SECUNDUS, A D c 61-c 113³), who frequently refers to the manners and customs of the literary world of his day But it is more interesting perhaps to quote some remarks of his on the subject of History His opinion may be compared with those of Cicero and Quintilian already recorded⁴ Once more History must bow the knee before Oratory

Pliny politely refuses a friend's request of him to write history He admits an overwhelming desire for at least a modest share of fame, and regards History as a comparatively easy means of attaining it He must, however, decline on other grounds.

¹ Here follows a gap in the MS., but it is quite clear how the sense must have proceeded

² The impromptu version of the Latin by the younger Pitt

³ See pp 341 ff

⁴ See p 364 and p 380

ORATORY and Poetry meet small favour unless carried to the highest point of eloquence ; but History, however executed, always pleases, for mankind are naturally inquisitive, and information, however baldly presented, has its charm for beings who adore even small talk and anecdote. But, besides this, I have an example in my own family that incites me to this pursuit, my uncle and adoptive father having been a historian, and that a very accurate one ; and I read in the philosophers that 'tis a high virtue to tread in the steps of our ancestors, when they have gone before us in the right path.

Why then, you ask, do I yet delay ? My reason is this : I have pleaded some very important causes, and (though I build but small hopes on them) I design to revise my speeches, lest for want of this last care all the pains they cost me should be thrown away, and they perish with their author ; for as far as posterity is concerned, a work that has not received the last polish counts no more than if you had never begun it. You will tell me, perhaps, I might correct my speeches and write history at the same time. I wish I could ; but they are both such great undertakings that to complete either of them would more than satisfy me. I was but nineteen when I first appeared at the bar ; and yet it is only now at last I perceive (and that in truth but dimly) what is essential to a complete orator. How then shall I be able to support the weight of an additional burthen ?

It is true, indeed, history and oratory have many common features, yet in these very apparent resemblances there are several contrasts. Both deal in narrative, but each after a the difference in the world, as Thucydides observes, between an *everlasting possession*¹ and a prize composition which is heard and forgotten, the first of which terms applies to History, the second to Oratory.

For these reasons I decline to intermingle two dissimilar pursuits, which are opposite just because they are both so highly important, lest, distraught by a sort of conflux, I should do in one case what is only proper to the other. Therefore (to keep to my professional language) I must beg leave the cause may be adjourned (Epp I v. 8, tr. Melmoth, revised by Hutchison)

To conclude this summary Latin Criticism, like other departments of Latin literature, is faithful to the national temperament. Intellectually, the Roman lacked the quick, determined curiosity of the Greek. He had a natural aversion from discussion for its own sake. In morals, he preferred practice to speculation. Habitually obedient to authority, he was predisposed to accept rather than dispute. The defects of these qualities appear in Latin criticism. Its faculty is often more rigid than strong, precise than fine. It is not well adapted to a sensitive balance between the two extremes of crude vigour and elaborate finish. Its critical principles do not result from free reflexion and discerning generalization: they are stiffly pieced together in compilations, catalogues, and conventional epithets. The weakness of the Latin 'critical apparatus' is that it is too much an apparatus. Its failings imply its strength. It is sane and shrewd, clear and positive, pointed and compact upon a consistently ethical basis. The influence of Horace and Quintilian over a long posterity of critics and writers in many languages is testimony enough of its value to the world at large.

¹ Thucydides claim for his own History (I 22 cf. The Pageant of Greece p. 201)

PART III. PROSE

•
•

HISTORY

THE earliest Roman histories, if we except the poetical annals of Naevius and Ennius, were written not in Latin but in Greek, sometimes by Romans, as, for instance, Quintus Fabius Pictor and Lucius Cincius Alimentus (c. 200 B. C.), sometimes by Greeks, as, for example, Polybius of Megalopolis, friend of the younger Scipio and historian of the Second Punic War. It is not until the time of the Gracchi (c. 120 B. C.) that we get Roman historians such as Lucius Cassius Hemina and Lucius Calpurnius Piso writing in Latin, and even they seem to have been little more than annalists; 'arid and meagre', says Cicero of the work of the latter. The first historical work of any importance (though but fragments of it have survived) is the Origines (Origins) of Marcus Porcius Cato. 'If I were allowed', wrote the historian Niebuhr, 'to conjure back into existence one lost work of antiquity that work would be the Origines of Cato.' Yet even these seven books seem to have been so marred by want of order, discursiveness, and irrelevance as scarcely to merit the title of history.

Of all the Roman histories which have survived, the earliest, and in many ways the best, are those of Rome's greatest man, GAIUS JULIUS CAESAR (100-44 B. C.). Besides letters, speeches, poems, grammatical treatises, and political pamphlets (all of which have disappeared) Caesar wrote histories of the Gallic and Civil Wars. The former was composed in the year 51 B. C. and consists of seven books, a book for each year of the Gallic campaigns (58-52); an eighth book was afterwards added by some officer of Caesar's staff to cover the next two years and so to complete the war. Over and above its obvious historical purpose the Gallic War was no doubt intended by its author as an attempt to justify not only his strategy, which was unimpeachable, but his political and constitutional position, which was not. The three books of the Civil War were published after Caesar's death, and, though the subject-matter is of greater interest, it cannot be said that either from a historical or an artistic point of view this later work reaches the high level of the earlier. This may be due to the fact that a longer interval separated the events and their narration, but it is more probably caused by faulty editing on the part of Caesar's literary executor. To the Civil War which only covered the events of the years 49 and 48 were added by later hands the Alexandrian War, the African War, and the Spanish War, but none of these with the possible exception of the first bears much resemblance to Caesar's work, and quite certainly none of them were written by him.

Perhaps the first thing that strikes one about the historical style of Caesar is its detachment, and it is typical of him that he writes throughout in the third person. There is moreover about it a lucidity and level-headedness which no selection of passages can satisfactorily illustrate, and to which no excerpts can do justice. There are no purple patches, no heroics, there is no straining after effect, no fine writing, no attempt at climax. Events are narrated simply and succinctly, 'as they actually were'—and this as Ranke said is the historian's function at its highest. Somewhere in the Civil War Caesar writes 'the lights of our camp drew night fire from the enemy's archers', and then adds 'this caused our men to light fires in one place and encamp in another. Could anything be terser?

The winter of 54/53 B.C. was marked by a serious uprising of the Gauls. The Eburones first overwhelmed Caesar's general Sabinus near the modern town of Maastricht, and then incited their neighbours, the Nervii, to rise against another of Caesar's officers, Quintus Cicero, brother of Marcus Tullius Cicero. The following passage relates the investment by the Nervii of Quintus Cicero near Brussels and his relief by Caesar from Amiens. Had Cicero suffered the fate of Sabinus (and he nearly did), Caesar's hopes in Gaul would have been at an end—but one does not hear much about the critical nature of the incident from the soldier-historian's quiet narrative.

AS the defence every day became more difficult and bazardous chiefly by the great multitude of killed and wounded which considerably lessened the number of defendants, Cicero sent letter upon letter to inform Cæsar of his danger. Many of these couriers falling into the enemy's hands were tortured to death within view of our soldiers. There was at that time in the Roman camp a Nervian of distinction by name Vertico who in the beginning of the siege had fled to Cicero and given ample proofs of his fidelity. This man, by the hopes of liberty, and a promise of great rewards, engaged one of his slaves to carry a letter to Cæsar. Having concealed it in his javelin, and passed through the camp of the Gauls without suspicion, as being himself of that nation, he arrived safe at Cæsar's quarters, who by this means was informed of the danger of Cicero and the legion.

Cæsar, receiving the letter about five in the afternoon, immediately dispatched a messenger to M. Crassus, who was quartered among the Bellovaci, twenty-five miles off, ordering him to draw out his legion at midnight, and march with all the expedition he could to join him. Crassus, according to his orders, came along with the courier. He sent likewise to C. Fabius, directing him to lead his legion into the country of the Atrebatians, which lay in the way to Cicero. He wrote to Labienus, if it could be done with safety, to meet him upon the frontiers of the Nervians. He himself in the mean-time assembled about four hundred horse from the nearest garrisons, resolving not to wait for the rest of the army, which lay at too great a distance.

At nine in the morning he had notice from his scouts of the arrival of Crassus. That day he marched twenty miles, leaving Crassus with a legion at *Samarobriva*¹, where he had deposited the baggage, hostages, publick papers and all the provisions which had been laid up for the winter. Fabius, in consequence of his instructions, having made all the haste he could, met him with his legion. Labienus, who had been informed of the death of Sabinus, and the destruction of the troops under his command, and who saw all the forces of Treves advancing against him; fearing lest, if he should quit his quarters, the enemy might construe it as a flight, and that it would be impossible for him to sustain their attack, especially as they were flushed with their late success; wrote to Cæsar, informing him of the danger that would attend the quitting his camp, of the disaster that happened among the Eburones, and that all the forces of the Treviri, both horse and foot, were encamped within three miles of him

¹ Amiens.

Cæsar approving his reasons, though he thereby found himself reduced from three to two legions, was yet sensible that all depended upon expedition. He makes forced marches, and reaching the territories of the *Nervi*ans, learns from some prisoners the state of the siege, and the danger the legion was in. Immediately he engages a Gaulish horseman, by the promise of great rewards, to carry a letter to Cicero. It was wrote in Greek characters, that if it fell into the enemy's hands, it might not be intelligible to them. The messenger had orders, in case he found it impracticable to penetrate himself into the Roman camp, to tie the letter to a javelin and throw it in. In this letter Cæsar sent Cicero word that he was already on the march to relieve him and would be up very soon, exhorting him in the mean time to defend himself with his wonted bravery. The Gaul dreading a discovery, threw the letter into the camp as he had been ordered but the javelin by accident sticking in a tower, remained there two days unperceived. On the third a soldier saw it took it down, and brought it to Cicero, who immediately read it in full assembly, and diffused the common joy through the whole camp. At the same time they perceived the smoke of the villages fired by Cæsar in his march, which put the arrival of the succours beyond all doubt.

(De Bell Gall v 37-40, tr W Duncan)

Caesar at the beginning of the Civil War (49 B C.) marched straight for Spain. Massilia (Marseilles) at that time as much a Greek city as a Roman, in spite of professed neutrality, was really an ally of Caesar's rival Pompey, and not daring to leave so important an enemy town on his line of communications, Caesar instructed his officers, Trebonius and Decimus Brutus, to take it. The attacks on Marseilles and its subsequent blockade involved the sea fight of which so vivid a picture is given by Caesar. Domitius was the Pompeian general defending the city.

THE Massilians, after their late defeat, had drawn as many old ships out of the docks as they had lost in the engagement; and repaired and rigged them with wondrous expedition. They were likewise well provided with rowers and pilots; and had prepared a number of fishing-barks, which they filled with archers and engines, and strengthened with roofs, to shelter the rowers from the enemy's darts. The fleet being equipped in this manner; the Massilians, animated by the prayers and tears of their old men, matrons, and virgins, to exert themselves in defence of their country in so pressing a conjuncture; embarked with no less confidence and assurance, than they had done before their late defeat. For such is the weakness of the human mind, that things dark, hidden, and unknown, always produce in us a greater degree of confidence or terror; as happened in the present case: for the arrival of Nasidius had filled all men with an uncommon share of hope and eagerness. The wind springing up fair, they set sail, and rendezvoused at Tauroenta, a castle belonging to the town, where Nasidius lay with his fleet. Here they put their ships in order, armed themselves with courage for a second encounter, and entering readily into all the measures proposed by Nasidius, left to him the command of the left wing, and stationed themselves upon the right.

Brutus sailed to meet them with his fleet considerably increased; for besides the ships which Cæsar had caused to be built at Arles, he had also joined to it six more taken from the Massilians, which he had refitted and rigged since the late action. Wherefore exhorting his men to despise an enemy who had not been able to resist them when entire and unvanquished, he advanced against them full of resolution and confidence. It was easy to discern from Trebonius's camp, and the eminences around it, what passed in the town. All the youth that were left, the old men, the women, children, and even the guards upon the walls, extending their hands to heaven, or repairing to the temples, and prostrating themselves at the altars, besought the gods to grant them victory Nor was there a man among them who did not believe, that their safety depended wholly on the issue of that day's action For the choice of their youth and the most considerable men of their city, were all on board the fleet insomuch, that in case of any disaster they had no resource left but should they obtain the victory, they were in hopes of preserving their city, either by their own forces or the reinforcements they expected from without

Accordingly in the engagement they behaved with the most determined courage The remembrance of what their wives and children had represented to them at their departure served to exalt their bravery, in a full persuasion that this was the last opportunity they should have of exerting themselves in defence of their country, and that if they fell in the engagement, their fellow-citizens could not long survive them, as their fate must be the same upon the taking of the town Our ships being at some distance from each other, both gave the enemy's pilots an opportunity of shewing their address in working their vessels and flying to the assistance of their friends, when they were laid hold on by our grappling-hooks And indeed, when it came to a close fight, they seconded the mountaineers with wonderful resolution, and in bravery seemed to yield but little to our men At the same time, a great quantity of darts poured incessantly from their smaller frigates, wounded a great many of our rowers, and such of the soldiers as were without shelter Two of their gallees fell upon that of Brutus, which was easily distinguished by its flag but, though they attacked him on both sides, he extricated himself with such agility and address, as in a short time to get a little before, which made them run foul of each other so violently, that they were both considerably shattered, one in particular had its beak broken, and was in a manner totally crushed, which being observed by those of our fleet that lay nearest, they suddenly fell upon and sunk them, before they could recover out of their disorder

THE Massilians, after their late defeat, had drawn as many old ships out of the docks as they had lost in the engagement; and repaired and rigged them with wondrous expedition. They were likewise well provided with rowers and pilots; and had prepared a number of fishing-barks, which they filled with archers and engines, and strengthened with roofs, to shelter the rowers from the enemy's darts. The fleet being equipped in this manner; the Massilians, animated by the prayers and tears of their old men, matrons, and virgins, to exert themselves in defence of their country in so pressing a conjuncture; embarked with no less confidence and assurance, than they had done before their late defeat. For such is the weakness of the human mind, that things dark, hidden, and unknown, always produce in us a greater degree of confidence or terror; as happened in the present case: for the arrival of Nasidius had filled all men with an uncommon share of hope and eagerness. The wind springing up fair, they set sail, and rendezvoused at Tauroenta, a castle belonging to the town, where Nasidius lay with his fleet. Here they put their ships in order, armed themselves with courage for a second encounter, and entering readily into all the measures proposed by Nasidius, left to him the command of the left wing, and stationed themselves upon the right.

Brutus sailed to meet them with his fleet considerably increased; for besides the ships which Cæsar had caused to be built at Arles, he had also joined to it six more taken from the Massilians, which he had refitted and rigged since the late action. Wherefore exhorting his men to despise an enemy who had not been able to resist them when entire and unvanquished, he advanced against them full of resolution and confidence. It was easy to discern from Trebonius's camp, and the eminences around it, what passed in the town. All the youth that were left, the old men, the women, children, and even the guards upon the walls, extending their hands to heaven, or repairing to the temples, and prostrating themselves at the altars, besought the gods to grant them victory Nor was there a man among them who did not believe, that their safety depended wholly on the issue of that day's action For the choice of their youth and the most considerable men of their city, were all on board the fleet insomuch, that in case of any disaster they had no resource left but should they obtain the victory, they were in hopes of preserving their city, either by their own forces or the reinforcements they expected from without

Accordingly in the engagement they behaved with the most determined courage The remembrance of what their wives and children had represented to them at their departure served to exalt their bravery, in a full persuasion that this was the last opportunity they should have of exerting themselves in defence of their country, and that if they fell in the engagement, their fellow-citizens could not long survive them as their fate must be the same upon the taking of the town Our ships being at some distance from each other, both gave the enemy's pilots an opportunity of shewing their address in working their vessels and flying to the assistance of their friends, when they were laid hold on by our grappling hooks And indeed when it came to a close fight, they seconded the mountaineers with wonderful resolution, and in bravery seemed to yield but little to our men At the same time, a great quantity of darts poured incessantly from their smaller frigates, wounded a great many of our rowers, and such of the soldiers as were without shelter Two of their gallees fell upon that of Brutus which was easily distinguished by its flag but, though they attacked him on both sides he extricated himself with such agility and address as in a short time to get a little before, which made them run foul of each other so violently, that they were both considerably shattered, one in particular had its beak broken and was in a manner totally crushed, which being observed by those of our fleet that lay nearest, they suddenly fell upon and sunk them before they could recover out of their disorder defeated, their archers and slingers cut to pieces, and their left wing surrounded and forced to fly.

Pompey seeing his cavalry routed, and that part of the army on which he chiefly depended put into disorder, despaired of being able to restore the battle, and quitted the field.

(De Bell. Civ. iii. 76-77, tr. W. Duncan.)

GAIUS SALLUSTIUS CRISPUS, the slightly younger contemporary of Caesar (86-34 B. C.), may fairly claim to be considered as the first consciously 'artistic' historian of Rome. He wrote, that is to say, not, like Caesar, as a politician or a general, but as a historian; he did not merely record events as they happened year by year, but, dropping the annalistic method, worked upon a definitely artistic scheme, introducing into his narrative speeches (the ancient historian's recognized method of criticizing historical events) after the manner of Thucydides upon whom he claimed to model his style. In politics Sallust was a democrat—hence his laudation of Caesar in the Catiline and of Marius in the Jugurthine War; he was a man of wealth and leisure who had held high office under Caesar and who had lived in personal contact with many of the men who figure in his books. Of his works we possess only the monograph on the Jugurthine War (111-105 B. C.), and that on the Catilinarian conspiracy of 63 B. C. What was perhaps his most important contribution to Roman history, five books of Historiae covering the dozen years 78-67, has unfortunately perished.

The Catilinarian conspiracy of 63 B. C. is still, in spite of Sallust's monograph and Cicero's four speeches (perhaps, in fact, because of the latter), shrouded in mystery. It is probably best regarded not as the work of the popular party taken as a whole (we cannot imagine Caesar implicated in so mad a scheme), but as the private attempt of Catiline; a dissolute but able patrician, defeated by Cicero that very year in the consular election—a man who, bankrupt as he was both in character and purse, rightly regarded revolution as his one chance.

Whatever its causes, the conspiracy was detected and crushed by the wisdom and promptness of Cicero. Catiline fled from Rome in November and in the following January was defeated and killed by Petreius near Pistoria. Catiline died better than he lived, and Sallust's account is not unworthy of his death.

PLTREIUS posted the veteran cohorts, which he had raised on this occasion, in the front, and the rest of his army behind them, as a body of reserve. He himself rode from rank to rank, and addressing himself to his men by their names, intreated and conjured them 'to remember that they were now to engage against unarmed robbers in defence of their gods, their country, their children, and their property' As he was an old soldier, having served in the army upwards of thirty years, as tribune, prefect, or prætor, and that with distinguished renown, he knew most of the soldiers and their gallant actions, and by calling these to remembrance he roused their courage.

Then, having taken all his measures with the utmost precaution, he sounded to battle, and ordered his cohorts to advance slowly. The enemy did the same. But when they were come near enough for the light armed soldiers to begin the fight, they set up a mighty shout, rushed with great fury into a close engagement, and laying aside their darts, made use of their swords only. The veterans, mindful of their former bravery, pressed vigorously on the rebels, who made a bold resistance, so that the fight was maintained with great obstinacy. Catiline was all the while in the first line, at the head of a light armed body, sustaining such as were severely pressed, putting fresh men in the room of those who were wounded, providing for every exigence, often charging the enemy in person, and performing at once the duty of a brave soldier and a great commander.

Petrenus, when he found that Catiline, contrary to his expectations, exerted himself with great vigor, brought up the prætorian cohort against his main body, broke their ranks, and made great slaughter of them, as he did likewise of the others who maintained their ground elsewhere. Then he fell on both the wings at once. Manlius and the other officer from Fæsulæ were both killed fighting in the foremost rank. Catiline, when he saw his forces routed, and himself left with a few only, mindful of his birth and former dignity, rushed headlong into the thickest of the enemy, where he fell covered with wounds, and fighting to the last.

When the engagement was ended, it evidently appeared with what undaunted spirit and resolution Catiline's army was fired : for the body of every one was found on that very spot which, during the battle, he had occupied ; those only excepted who were forced from their posts by the prætorian cohort ; and even they, though they fell a little out of their ranks, were all wounded before. Catiline himself was found far from his own men, amidst the dead bodies of the enemy, breathing a little, with an air of that fierceness still in his face which he had when alive. Finally, in all his army there was not so much as one free citizen taken prisoner, either in the engagement or in the flight ; for they spared their own lives as little as those of the enemy. The army of the republic obtained the victory indeed ; but it was neither a cheap nor a joyful one ; for their bravest men were either slain in battle or dangerously wounded. As there were many, too, who went to view the field, either out of curiosity or a desire of plunder, in turning over the dead bodies, some found a friend, some a relation, and some a guest ; others there were likewise who discovered their enemies : so that through the whole army there appeared a mixture of gladness and sorrow, joy and mourning.

(Catilina, 62-4, tr. W. Rose.)

An incident in the Jugurthine War.

AT the time appointed, the party left the camp, having previously taken such measures as were necessary for the expedition. The centurions, according to the instructions which they had received from their guide, had changed their arms and dress, and marched with their head and feet bare, that they might have the freer prospect, and climb with more facility. Their swords and bucklers were slung across their shoulders ; the latter of which were of the Numidian kind, and covered with hides, as well for the sake of lightness as that all noise might be avoided, if they struck against the rock.

The Ligurian, leading the way, fixed cords about the stones, and such roots of trees as appeared proper for the purpose, to assist the soldiers in climbing, stretching his hand, from time to time, to such as were discouraged at so rugged a march. When the ascent was more steep than ordinary, he would send them up before him unarmed, and then follow himself with their arms. Wherever it appeared more dangerous to climb, he went foremost, and by ascending and descending several times, encouraged the rest to follow him, and retired to make way for them. At length, after much tedious labor, they gained the castle, which was quite naked on that side, the Numidians being all employed in the opposite quarter.

When Marius was informed of the success of the Ligurian, although he had kept the garrison employed the whole of the day by a continued attack, he now, encouraging the soldiers, sallied from under the moving galleries, and drawing up his men under cover of their shields,¹ rushed forward to the castle, while the slingers and archers poured their volleys from a distance, and the engines incessantly played on the besieged. The Numidians, who had often before broken to pieces and even burned the Roman galleries, did not now defend themselves within their battlements, but passed whole days and nights without their walls, reviling the efforts of the Romans, upbraiding Marius with madness, and, in the height of their exultation, threatening to make our men slaves of Jugurtha.

While both sides were warmly engaged in this vigorous struggle for glory and empire on the one hand, and life and liberty on the other, the trumpets on a sudden sounded in the enemy's rear. The women and children, who had come out to see the engagement, first fled in dismay, after them such as were nearest the walls, and at last the whole, armed and unarmed, fairly gave way. The Romans now pressed onward with greater vigor, overthrowing the enemy, and wounding most of them; then advancing over the heaps of slain, they flew to the walls, all thirsting for glory, and each striving to be foremost, without regard to plunder. Thus did accidental success justify the rashness of Marius, while his imprudence contributed to heighten his glory. (Jugurtha, 99, tr. W. Rose.)

¹ i. e. each man with his shield held above his head, the shields being interlocked. This was known as the testudo or 'tortoise' formation.

The extant work of Caesar and Sallust comprises the stories of three wars and one political crisis; with Livy we get for the first time a complete history of Rome.

Of the life of TITUS LIVIUS we know very little. He was born at Patavium (the modern Padua) in 59 B. C., and according to the literary critics never quite lost, even on his removal to Rome, a trace of provincialism in his style. He was, besides being a historian, something of a philosopher, and indeed wrote philosophical dialogues after the manner of Plato. It says much for Livy as a man that in spite of a strong anti-Caesarian and pro-Pompeian bias, noticeable in that part of his history which concerned the Civil War, he won and retained the affectionate friendship of Augustus. He outlived that emperor by but three years, dying in A. D. 17.

The scope of Livy's historical work can be gathered from its title, 'Ab urbe condita libri', 'Books from the foundation of the city'. It began, that is, with the coming of Aeneas to the site of what was afterwards Rome, and ended with the death of Drusus in the year A. D. 9. The whole narrative occupied the astonishing number of 142 books, but of these only 35 survive—the first ten, taking us from Aeneas to the end of the Second Samnite War (293 B. C.), and Books 21–45 (the last five in an incomplete state), which comprise the period between the outbreak of the Second Punic War (218 B. C.) and the defeat of the Macedonian King Perseus by Lucius Aemilius Paulus at Pydna (168 B. C.). The vast remainder exists merely in fragments or epitomes or (a more important consideration) as re-presented, in a more or less assimilated form, in the pages of later historians.

Livy was essentially a historian with a purpose. That purpose was, as he tells us in his preface, to check the growing moral and political corruption of Rome by an appeal to Rome's citizens to mark her glorious past and keep before their minds the possibilities of her imperial future. 'To the following considerations', he writes, 'I wish every one seriously and earnestly to apply his thoughts by what kind of men and by what sort of conduct, in peace and war, the empire has been both acquired and extended, then, as discipline gradually declined, let him follow in his thoughts the structure of ancient morals, at first, as it were, leaning aside, then sinking farther and farther, then beginning to fall precipitate, until he arrives at the present times, when our vices have attained to such a height of enormity that we can endure neither the burden of them nor the sharpness of the remedies necessary to correct them'¹

Dante speaks of Livy as one who did not err²—but it must be admitted that he did from the point of view of the modern historian 'err' in three ways his chronology is shaky, his battle-scenes (of which he is very fond) are neither convincing nor even always intelligible, and he was careless about his sources, always preferring a good story to the more bald and literal truth. But he had more than the qualities of this last defect, and in nothing is the literary skill of Livy more apparent than in his stories. The first ten books in particular are crowded with persons and scenes half mythical, half historical—Horatius keeping the bridge, Manlius and sacred geese whose cackling saved the Capitol, Scaevola thrusting his right arm into the flame to illustrate to the Etruscans a Roman's indifference to pain—and all these stories are told with a mastery of phrase and a charm that, while it delights, makes one regret that the ancient world knew not the historical novel. Of all historical novelists Livy would perhaps have been the greatest.

Most of the translations which follow are by the Elizabethan scholar Philemon Holland. They are diffuse and not always accurate but those two things must be forgiven for the beauty of their style.

This famous incident is attributed by historians to the year 362 B. C. Whether true or not—and its citation to explain the name Curtius lacus (Curtian lake) is suspicious—it makes an excellent story and is told with Livy's usual vigour.

THE same yeare, by earthquake or some other forcible violence the common place called Forum, clave and opened wide vaineere in the mids and suncke downe to an exceeding depth neither could that chuncke or pit be filled up, by casting in of earth (notwithstanding every man laboured and brought what he could) before that they began to enquire, according as they were admonished by the divine Oracles, what it might be, wherein the most puissance and greatnes of the people of Rome consisted. (For the wisards prophesied, That if they would have the state of Rome to remain sure for ever, they should dedicat and offer it, whatsoever it was, unto that place.) And when they were in doubt what this should be, it is reported, that M. Curtius, a right hardie knight and martiall yong gentleman, rebuked them theriore, because they doubted whether the Romanes had any earthly thing better than armour and valor? Herewith, after silence made, he liit up his eies, and beheld the temples of the immortall gods, scituate neere to the Forum, and the Capitoll likewise; and stretching forth his hands, one while toward heaven, another while to the gaping chinckes and gulfe in the earth, toward the infernall spirits beneath, hee offered and devoted himselfe to assured death. And mounting upon a brave courser, as richly trapped and set out, as possiblie he could devise, armed as he was at all peeces, he leapt horse and man and all into the hole.

¹ G. Baker's translation of the Preface

² Inferno xxviii 12

(vii. 6, tr. Holland.)

Hannibal marching from Spain crossed the Alps in 218 B. C. Livy's account is picturesque and dramatic, but it is significant that Hannibal's exact route is still a matter of dispute.

THE next day, as the savages attacked with less vigour, the column closed up, and the pass was surmounted, not without loss, more, however, of baggage animals than of men. From that time the natives made their appearance in smaller numbers and behaved more like banditti than regular soldiers; they attacked either front or rear just as the ground gave them opportunity, or as the advance or halt of the column presented a chance of surprise. The elephants caused considerable delay, owing to the difficulty of getting them through narrow or precipitous places; on the other hand, they rendered that part of the column safe from attack where they were, for the natives were unaccustomed to the sight of them and had a great dread of going too near them

Nine days from their commencing the ascent they arrived at the highest point of the Alps, after traversing a region mostly without roads and frequently losing their way either through the treachery of their guides or through their own mistakes in trying to find the way for themselves. For two days they remained in camp on the summit, whilst the troops enjoyed a respite from fatigue and fighting. Some of the baggage animals which had fallen amongst the rocks and had afterwards followed the track of the column came into camp. To add to the misfortunes of the worn out troops, there was a heavy fall of snow—the Pleiads were near their setting—and this new experience created considerable alarm.

In the early morning of the third day the army recommenced its heavy march over ground everywhere deep in snow. Hannibal saw in all faces an expression of listlessness and despondency. He rode on in front to a height from which there was a wide and extensive view, and halting his men he pointed out to them the land of Italy and the rich valley of the Po lying at the foot of the Alps. 'You are now,' he said, 'crossing the barriers not only of Italy, but of Rome itself. Henceforth all will be smooth and easy for you, in one or at the most, two battles, you will be masters of the capital and stronghold of Italy.'

Then the army resumed its advance with no annoyance from the enemy beyond occasional attempts at plunder. The remainder of the march, however, was attended with much greater difficulty than they had experienced in the ascent, for the distance to the plains on the Italian side is shorter, and therefore the descent is necessarily steeper. Almost the whole of the way was precipitous, narrow, and slippery, so that they were unable to keep their footing and if they slipped they could not recover themselves, they kept falling over each other, and the baggage animals rolled over on their drivers.

At length they came to a much narrower pass which descended over such sheer cliffs that a light-armed soldier could hardly get down it even by hanging on to projecting roots and branches. The place had always been precipitous, and a landslip had recently carried away the road for 1,000 feet. The cavalry came to a halt here as though they had arrived at their journey's end, and whilst Hannibal was wondering what could be causing the delay he was informed that there was no passage. Then he went forward to examine the place and saw that there was nothing for it but to lead the army by a long circuitous route over pathless and untrodden snow. But this, too, soon proved to be impracticable. The old snow had been covered to a moderate depth by a fresh fall, and the first comers planted their feet firmly on the new snow, but when it had become melted under the tread of so many men and beasts there was nothing to walk on but ice covered with slush. Their progress now became one incessant and miserable struggle. The smooth ice allowed no foothold, and as they were going down a steep incline they were still less able to keep on their legs, whilst, once down, they tried in vain to rise, as their hands and knees were continually slipping. There were no stumps or roots about for them to get hold of and support themselves by, so they rolled about helplessly on the glassy ice and slushy snow. The baggage animals as they toiled along cut through occasionally into the lowest layer of snow, and when they stumbled they struck out their hoofs in their struggles to recover themselves and broke through into the hard and congealed ice below, where most of them stuck as though caught in a gin.

At last, when men and beasts alike were worn out by their fruitless exertions, a camp was formed on the summit, after the place had been cleared with immense difficulty owing to the quantity of snow that had to be removed. The next thing was to level the rock through which alone a road was practicable. The soldiers were told off to cut through it. They built up against it an enormous pile of tall trees which they had felled and lopped, and when the wind was strong enough to blow up the fire they set light to the pile. When the rock was red hot they poured vinegar upon it to disintegrate it. After thus treating it by fire they opened a way through it with their tools, and eased the steep slope by winding tracks of moderate gradient, so that not only the baggage animals but even the elephants could be led down.

Four days were spent over the rock, and the animals were almost starved to death, for the heights are mostly bare of vegetation and what herbage there is is buried beneath the snow. In the lower levels there were sunny valleys and streams flowing through woods, and spots more deserving of human inhabitants. Here the beasts were turned loose to graze, and the troops, worn out with their engineering, were allowed to rest. In three days more they reached the open plains and found a pleasanter country and pleasanter people living in it.

(xxi. 35-7, tr W. L. Roberts.)

During the Second Punic War Syracuse, which under Hiero had been Rome's faithful ally, declared, under Hippocrates and Epicydes for Carthage. Marcus Marcellus laid siege to it in 214 B. C., but, thanks largely to Archimedes, did not take it till 212 B. C.

WHICH enterprise of theirs, so resolutely begun, and so hotely and forcible followed, had sped well and taken effect if one man at that time had not been in Syracuse. Archimedes was hee, a singular Astronomer. A rare man for contemplation & beholding the skie with the plannets, and other starres therein fixed. but a more wonderfull enginer, for devising and framing of artillerie, ordnance fabrickes, and instruments of warre whereby he would with very little ado and at ease, checke and frustrate all the inventions which the enemies with so great difficultie had prepared for to give the assault. This cunning artificer and admirable workman had planted engines of all sorts upon the curtaine of the wall, which stood on certaine hils and those not of even height and baying for the most part high places that yeilded hard accesse, and some other low over such sheer cliffs that a light-armed soldier could hardly get down it even by hanging on to projecting roots and branches. The place had always been precipitous, and a landslip had recently carried away the road for 1,000 feet. The cavalry came to a halt here as though they had arrived at their journey's end, and whilst Hannibal was wondering what could be causing the delay he was informed that there was no passage. Then he went forward to examine the place and saw that there was nothing for it but to lead the army by a long circuitous route over pathless and untrodden snow. But this, too, soon proved to be impracticable. The old snow had been covered to a moderate depth by a fresh fall, and the first comers planted their feet firmly on the new snow, but when it had become melted under the tread of so many men and beasts there was nothing to walk on but ice covered with slush. Their progress now became one incessant and miserable struggle. The smooth ice allowed no foothold, and as they were going down a steep incline they were still less able to keep on their legs, whilst, once down, they tried in vain to rise, as their hands and knees were continually slipping. There were no stumps or roots about for them to get hold of and support themselves by, so they rolled about helplessly on the glassy ice and slushy snow. The baggage animals as they toiled along cut through occasionally into the lowest layer of snow, and when they stumbled they struck out their hoofs in their struggles to recover themselves and broke through into the hard and congealed ice below, where most of them stuck as though caught in a gin.

At last, when men and beasts alike were worn out by their fruitless exertions, a camp was formed on the summit, after the place had been cleared with immense difficulty owing to the quantity of snow that had to be removed. The next thing was to level the rock through which alone a road was practicable. The soldiers were told off to cut through it. They built up against it an enormous pile of tall trees which they had felled and lopped, and when the wind was strong enough to blow up the fire they set light to the pile. When the rock was red hot they poured vinegar upon it to disintegrate it. After thus treating it by fire they opened a way through it with their tools, and eased the steep slope by winding tracks of moderate gradient, so that not only the baggage animals but even the elephants could be led down.

Four days were spent over the rock, and the animals were almost starved to death, for the heights are mostly bare of vegetation and what herbage there is is buried beneath the snow. In the lower levels there were sunny valleys and streams flowing through woods, and spots more deserving of human inhabitants. Here the beasts were turned loose to graze, and the troops, worn out with their engineering, were allowed to rest. In three days more they reached the open plains and found a pleasanter country and pleasanter people living in it.

(xxi 35-7, fr W L Roberts)

During the Second Punic War Syracuse, which under Hiero had been Rome's faithful ally, declared, under Hippocrates and Epicydes, for Carthage. Marcus Marcellus laid siege to it in 214 B C, but, thanks largely to Archimedes, did not take it till 213 B C.

WHICH enterprise of theirs so resolutely begun, and so hotely and forcible followed, had sped well and taken effect, if one man at that time had not been in Syracuse. Archimedes was hee, a singular Astronomer. A rare man for contemplation & beholding the skie with the plannets, and other starres therein fixed. but a more wonderfull enginer, for devising and framing of artillerie, ordnance, fabrickes, and instruments of warre whereby he would with very little ado and at ease, checke and frustrate all the inventions which the enemies with so great difficultie had prepared for to give the assault. This cunning artificer and admirable workeman had planted engines of all sorts upon the curtaine of the wall which stood on certaine hils and those not of even beigth and having for the most part high places that yielded hard accesse, and some other low

An incident in the Third Macedonian War (171-167 B.C.).

THE elephants troubled the march as much in manner as the enemies could : for when they were come to a place where they could see no way, downe they cast their riders and governours, laying them along on the earth, and with the horrible braying that they made, affrighted their horses especially, untill such time as a devise was found for their passage. They began first to make the head or entrance of a bridge at the very brow and edge of a steepe downefall : this done, in the lower ground beneath, they set fast in the earth good strong and long posts of wood, two by two distant one from the other traversewise little more than the largenes of one of those beasts. Vpon which rested fast joined with tennon & mortise certain rafters like wal-plats 30 foot in length, and those being couched with planks crosse over in forme of a bridge, had earth and mould cast thereupon. A little way off beneath it, such another bridge was made ; and so a third likewise, and many more consequently according as the craggie ground was broken and uneven. Now the Elephant from the firme ground entred upon the first bridge aforesaid ; but before he was gone as farre as to the foot and end therof, the posts abovenamed were cut a two underneath ; to the end that the bridge might fall, and in the easie reeling therof the beast also gently slide, as it were, and be carried therewith as farre as the head of a second bridge. Thus some of them glided and kept themselves standing upright on their feet, others rested upon their buttockes. Againe, when they were come to the plaine and levell floure of another such like bridge, by the fall of it in manner aforesaid they were driven unto a third bridge beneath it, untill such time as they were come to a more plaine and even valley.

(xliv. 5. tr. Holland.)

One of the earliest writers to extract metal from the rich historical mine of Livy was GAIUS VELLEIUS PATERCULUS¹, who, in the year A. D. 29, wrote an abridged history of Rome in two books, partly to employ his leisure and partly with the purpose

¹ See pp. 373 f.

five Times. The Images and Decorations of his Gallick Triumph were of Citron Wood, and those of his Pontick, of Acacia: He made Use of Tortoise Shell in his Alexandrian Triumph, of Ivory in his African, and of polished Silver in his Triumph over Spain. The Money raised out of the Spoils was above six hundred Millions of Sesterces. But this great Man, who had so mildly used all his Victories, was not allowed a quiet Enjoyment of the Sovereignty more than five Months. For he returned to the City in October, and was murdered on the Ides of March next after, by a Band of Conspirators, of whom Brutus and Cassius were the Leaders. One of these he had not obliged, by promising him the Consulship, as he had highly offended the other by delaying his Advancement to that Office. Besides them, there were several more of Cæsar's most intimate Friends in the Design, who, by the Success of that Cause, had been promoted to the highest Dignities. Such were Dec. Brutus, C. Trebonius, and others of Note and Distinction in the State. Now M. Antony, Cæsar's Colleague in the Consulship, one who was fit for any desperate Attempt, had greatly contributed to irreconcile the Senate to him. This he did, by presenting him with a Regal Diadem, as he was sitting in the Rostrum, to see the Ceremonies of the Lupercalia. Cæsar indeed rejected it, but with an Air however, that signified very little Dissatisfaction.

Hirtius and Pansa had constantly advised Cæsar, As he had acquired, so likewise to maintain the Monarchy by his Sword. This was now found by woful Experience to have been good Counsel. But he still declaring, That he would rather be dead than dreaded: And hoping to meet with the same Clemency from others, that he himself had display'd in so extraordinary a Manner towards all, fell, ere he was aware, into the Murderous Hands of a Knot of ungrateful Men. Many Prodigies and Presages forewarn'd him of the impending Danger. The Sooth-sayers caution'd him to beware of the Ides of March. His Wife Calpurnia, frighted by a Dream, conjur'd him to stay at Home that Day; and a little Schedule containing a Discovery of the Plot, was put into his Hands but the perusal of it was unfortunately delayed. Thus we learn how irresistible the Power of Fate is and how far the Gods may blind and infatuate the Minds of those they have marked out for Destruction

(Hist li 56 57, tr J Paterson.)

It is a curious fact that we are least well informed as to the details of the life of Rome's greatest historian. We know neither the year in which CORNELIUS TACITUS¹ was born nor that in which he died, nor even his 'Christian' name. He was Consul in the second year of Nerva's reign (A.D. 97) and as we chance to gather from an inscription governor of the province of Asia under Nerva's successor Trajan. He presumably died about the year 118. Tacitus must have been in his prime during the reign of Domitian (A.D. 81-96) but he knew better than to try and write history under an emperor from whose spiteful temper neither author nor book betraying republican sentiments would be safe. The only work therefore which can be attributed to these fifteen years is a Dialogue upon Oratory. Two years after the tyrant's death however Tacitus published two historical or quasi-historical works: one was a life of his father-in-law Agricola the famous governor of Britain and the other an ethnographical monograph the Germania in which he gives a detailed account of the tribes of Germany, their position origin climate manners and so forth.

These however were but a prelude to his great historical works the Histories which covered the period from the accession of Galba to the death of Domitian (A.D. 69-96) and the still later composed Annals which extending as they did from Augustus to the death of Nero (A.D. 68) formed a history of the Julio-Claudian dynasty.

Here are to begin with Tacitus's own views on the historian and his office. It is interesting to compare these passages with Livy's introduction.²

I AM well aware that much of what I have related and still have to relate may seem of little moment and too trifling to be recorded. But none can compare my subject with that of those who wrote the early history of Rome. They had great wars to describe the storming of cities the rout and capture of kings ; or if they turned to affairs at home, they could enlarge freely on the conflicts of Consuls with Tribunes, on land laws and corn laws, on struggles between patricians and plebeians. My theme is narrow and inglorious : a peace unbroken, or disturbed only by petty wars ; a distressful course of events in Rome ; a prince with no interest in the expansion of the Empire. It may serve some good purpose, nevertheless, to look closely into these things, at first sight so unimportant ; since it is often from such beginnings that mighty movements take their rise.

¹ See pp. 394 ff. 499 ff.

² See p. 424.

For every country and city must be ruled either by the populace, or by the few, or by one man ; a form of government selected and compounded out of these elements, may be commended more easily than brought into being ; nor could it endure were it set up. And just as in former times, when the people held all power, men had to study the temper of the multitude, and learn how to control and guide it : or again, when the patricians were all-powerful, those who had learnt best to understand the mind of the Senate and of the aristocracy were deemed wise men, and cunning in the times : so now, when things are changed, and Rome is, in fact, under the rule of a single man, it may prove useful to enquire into and record such things as I have to tell. For but few have wisdom enough of their own to distinguish what is honourable from what is base, the expedient from the hurtful ; most men have to learn these things from the experience of others. And yet such enquiries, however profitable they may be, afford but little entertainment. Descriptions of new countries : the varied incidents of battle : the deaths of famous leaders : these are topics which interest and refresh the reader's mind. My task is to record a succession of cruel edicts, of prosecutions heaped on prosecutions ; to tell of friends betrayed, or innocent men brought to ruin, of trials all ending in one way, with a uniformity as monotonous as it is revolting.

(Ann. iv. 32-3, tr. G. G. Ramsay.)

IF I were telling of foreign wars, and of men dying for their country in ways thus like each other, I should even so be surfeited, and expect my readers to feel weariness and disgust at this long sad tale of citizens coming, however nobly, to their end; but the story of all this servile endurance, all this blood wasted wantonly at home, wears out the mind and wrings the soul with melancholy. Nor can I ask my readers to accept any other plea than this—that I cannot blame the men who perished thus ingloriously. For these things came of the wrath of the Gods against Rome—a wrath that may not be passed over, as when armies are routed or cities captured, with a single mention. Let this tribute at least be paid to these illustrious men in the after time—that as in their burial they were divided from the common herd, so in the record of their end they may receive an abiding monument of their own.

(Ann xvi 16, tr G G Ramsay)

The peroration to the life of Agricola

THOU wast indeed fortunate, Agricola, not only in the splendour of thy life, but in the opportune moment of thy death. Thou submittedst to thy fate, so they tell us who were present to hear thy last words, with courage and cheerfulness, seeming to be doing all thou couldst to give thine Emperor full acquittal. As for me and thy daughter, besides all the bitterness of a father's loss, it increases our sorrow that it was not permitted us to watch over thy failing health, to comfort thy weakness, to satisfy ourselves with those looks, those embraces. Assuredly we should have received some precepts, some utterances to fix in our inmost hearts. This is the bitterness of our sorrow, this the smart of our wound, that from the circumstance of so long an absence thou wast lost to us four years before. Doubtless, best of fathers, with thine most loving wife at thy side, all the dues of affection were abundantly paid thee, yet with too few tears thou wast laid to thy rest, and in the light of thy last day there was something for which thine eyes longed in vain.

If there is any dwelling-place for the spirits of the just ; if, as the wise believe, noble souls do not perish with the body, rest thou in peace ; and call us, thy family, from weak regrets and womanish laments to the contemplation of thy virtues, for which we must not weep nor beat the breast. Let us honour thee not so much with transitory praises as with our reverence, and, if our powers permit us, with our emulation. That will be true respect, that the true affection of thy nearest kin. This, too, is what I would enjoin on daughter and wife, to honour the memory of that father, that husband, by pondering in their hearts all his words and acts, by cherishing the features and lineaments of his character rather than those of his person. It is not that I would forbid the likenesses which are wrought in marble or in bronze ; but as the faces of men, so all similitudes of the face are weak and perishable things, while the fashion of the soul is everlasting, such as may be expressed not in some foreign substance, or by the help of art, but in our own lives. Whatever we loved, whatever we admired in Agricola, survives, and will survive in the hearts of men, in the succession of the ages, in the fame that waits on noble deeds. Over many indeed, of those who have gone before, as over the inglorious and ignoble, the waves of oblivion will roll ; Agricola, made known to posterity by history and tradition, will live for ever.

(Agr. 45, 46, tr. Church and Brodribb.)

The German tribes of the far north. The Suiones are certainly, from the form of their name, the Swedes, but the meaning of the 'other sea' which Tacitus distinguishes from 'the Ocean' is not clear.

BEYOND the Suiones is another sea, sluggish and almost motionless, which, we may certainly infer, girdles and surrounds the world, from the fact that the last radiance of the setting sun lingers on till sunrise, with a brightness sufficient to dim the light of the stars. Even the very sound of his rising, as popular belief adds, may be heard, and the forms of gods and the glory round his head may be seen. Only thus far (and here rumour seems truth) does the world extend.

At this point the Suevic sea on its eastern shore, washes the tribes of the Æstii, whose rites and fashions and style of dress are those of the Suevi, while their language is more like the British. They worship the mother of the gods and wear as a religious symbol the device of a wild boar. This serves as armour, and as a universal defence, rendering the votary of the goddess safe even amidst enemies. They often use clubs iron weapons but seldom. They are more patient in cultivating corn and other produce than might be expected from the general indolence of the Germans. But they also search the deep, and are the only people who gather amber (which they call glesum), in the shallows and also on the shore itself. Barbarians as they are they have not investigated or discovered what natural cause or process produces it. Nay it even lay amid the sea's other refuse till our luxury gave it a name. To them it is utterly useless. they gather it in its raw state, bring it to us in shapeless lumps and marvel at the price which they receive. It is however a juice from trees, as you may infer from the fact that there are often seen shining through it reptiles, and even winged insects which, having become entangled in the fluid, are gradually enclosed in the substance as it hardens. I am therefore inclined to think that the islands and countries of the West, like the remote recesses of the East where frankincense and balsam exude contain fruitful woods and groves, that these productions acted on by the near rays of the sun glide in a liquid state into the adjacent sea, and are thrown up by the force of storms on the opposite shores. If you test the composition of amber by applying fire it burns like pinewood and sends forth a rich and fragrant flame. it is soon softened into something like pitch or resin.

Closely bordering on the Suiones are the tribes of the Sitones, which resembling them in all else differ only in being ruled by a woman. So low have they fallen not merely from freedom, but even from slavery itself. Here Suevia ends.

(Germ 45 tr Church and Brodrick)

The year A.D. 69 was perhaps the most eventful year of the first century. In the winter of the year before, Nero, hearing of the simultaneous revolts of Galba in Spain and Vindex in Gaul, committed suicide. Vindex had already been defeated and killed by Virginius Rufus, the loyal governor of Upper Germany, and Galba was left to march at the head of his troops unopposed into Italy. 'The secret of empire', as Tacitus said, 'had been revealed, that an emperor could be created elsewhere than at Rome.' But if one emperor could, so could another. On January 1, 69, the legions of Germany refused the customary oath of allegiance to Galba and saluted as emperor Aulus Vitellius, governor of the lower province. Vitellius was an old, feeble, and gluttonous man, and Galba might easily have held his own against him had he not made the fatal mistake of adopting and making 'Caesar' (i.e. heir apparent) a certain Piso, thus excluding from all hopes of succession and even power Otho, the governor of Lusitania (Portugal), who had been his staunchest supporter and had actually marched with him to Rome. Angered by this act Otho deserted Galba and won over to himself the all-powerful Praetorian Guard who on January 15 deposed the emperor, murdered both him and Piso, and bestowed the purple on their new idol. But Otho did not enjoy his elevation for long. Marching north to arrest the advance of Vitellius's forces into Italy, he was defeated at the battle of Bedriacum, just north of the Po. The extract below tells of his consequent suicide.

AFTER some such speech as this he urged them courteously to hurry away and not to exasperate the victor by their hesitation. To each man's age and position he paid due regard, using his authority with the young and persuasion with his elders, while his quiet looks and firm speech helped to control their ill-timed tears. He gave orders for boats and carriages to be provided for their departure. All petitions and letters containing any compliments to himself, or marked insults to Vitellius, he destroyed, and distributed his money carefully, not like a man at the point of death. He then actually tried to comfort the sorrowful fears of his nephew, Salvius Cocceianus, by praising his attachment and chiding his alarm. 'Do you imagine', he said, 'that Vitellius will be so hard-hearted as not to show me some gratitude for saving his whole household ' By promptly putting an end to myself I deserve to earn some mercy for my family For it is not in blank despair, but with my army clamouring for battle, that I determine to save my country from the last calamities I have won enough fame for myself and ennoblement for my posterity, for, after the line of the Julians, Claudians, Servians, I have been the first to bring the principate into a new family So rouse yourself and go on with your life Never forget that Otho was your uncle, yet keep your remembrance within bounds '

After this he made them all retire and rested for a while But his last reflexions were interrupted by a sudden disturbance and the news of a mutinous outbreak among the troops They were threatening to kill all those who were leaving, and turned with especial violence against Verginius, whose house was in a state of siege Otho rebuked the ringleaders and returned, consenting to receive the adieux of those who were going, until it was time for them to depart in safety As the day deepened into evening he quenched his thirst with a drink of iced water. Two daggers were brought to him and, after trying them both, he put one under his pillow Being assured on inquiry that his friends had started, he spent a peaceful night, not, it is said, without sleep At break of day he fell upon his dagger Hearing his dying groan, his slaves and freedmen entered with Plotius Firmus, the Prefect of the Guards, and found a single wound in his breast The funeral was hurried forward out of respect for his own earnest entreaties, for he had been afraid his head might be cut off and subjected to outrage The Guard carried the body, sounding his praises with tears in their eyes, and covering his hands and wounded breast with kisses Some of the soldiers killed themselves beside the pyre, not because they had harmed Vitellius or feared reprisals, but from love of their emperor, and to follow his noble example Similar suicides became common afterwards at Bedriacum and Placentia, and in other encampments An inconspicuous tomb was built for Otho, as being less

The year A.D. 69 was perhaps the most eventful year of the first century. In the winter of the year before, Nero, hearing of the simultaneous revolts of Galba in Spain and Vindex in Gaul, committed suicide. Vindex had already been defeated and killed by Virginius Rufus, the loyal governor of Upper Germany, and Galba was left to march at the head of his troops unopposed into Italy. 'The secret of empire', as Tacitus said, 'had been revealed, that an emperor could be created elsewhere than at Rome.' But if one emperor could, so could another. On January 1, 69, the legions of Germany refused the customary oath of allegiance to Galba and saluted as emperor Aulus Vitellius, governor of the lower province. Vitellius was an old, feeble, and gluttonous man, and Galba might easily have held his own against him had he not made the fatal mistake of adopting and making 'Caesar' (i.e. heir apparent) a certain Piso, thus excluding from all hopes of succession and even power Otho, the governor of Lusitania (Portugal), who had been his staunchest supporter and had actually marched with him to Rome. Angered by this act Otho deserted Galba and won over to himself the all-powerful Praetorian Guard who on January 15 deposed the emperor, murdered both him and Piso, and bestowed the purple on their new idol. But Otho did not enjoy his elevation for long. Marching north to arrest the advance of Vitellius's forces into Italy, he was defeated at the battle of Bedriacum, just north of the Po. The extract below tells of his consequent suicide.

AFTER some such speech as this he urged them courteously to hurry away and not to exasperate the victor by their hesitation. To each man's age and position he paid due regard, using his authority with the young and persuasion with his elders, while his quiet looks and firm speech helped to control their ill-timed tears. He gave orders for boats and carriages to be provided for their departure. All petitions and letters containing any compliments to himself, or marked insults to Vitellius, he destroyed, and distributed his money carefully, not like a man at the point of death. He then actually tried to comfort the sorrowful fears of his nephew, Salvius Cocceianus, by praising his attachment and chiding his alarm. 'Do you imagine', he said, 'that Vitellius will be so hard-hearted as not to show me some gratitude for saving his whole household ? By promptly putting an end to myself I deserve to earn some mercy for my family For it is not in blank despair, but with my army clamouring for battle, that I determine to save my country from the last calamities I have won enough fame for myself and ennoblement for my posterity, for, after the line of the Julians, Claudians, Servians, I have been the first to bring the principate into a new family So rouse yourself and go on with your life Never forget that Otho was your uncle, yet keep your remembrance within bounds '

After this he made them all retire and rested for a while But his last reflexions were interrupted by a sudden disturbance and the news of a mutinous outbreak among the troops They were threatening to kill all those who were leaving, and turned with especial violence against Verginius, whose house was in a state of siege Otho rebuked the ringleaders and returned consenting to receive the adieux of those who were going, until it was time for them to depart in safety As the day deepened into evening he quenched his thirst with a drink of iced water Two daggers were brought to him and after trying them both he put one under his pillow Being assured on inquiry that his friends had started, he spent a peaceful night, not, it is said, without sleep At break of day he fell upon his dagger Hearing his dying groan, his slaves and freedmen entered with Plotius Firmus, the Prefect of the Guards and found a single wound in his breast The funeral was hurried forward out of respect for his own earnest entreaties, for he had been afraid his head might be cut off and subjected to outrage The Guard carried the body, sounding his praises with tears in their eyes, and covering his hands and wounded breast with kisses Some of the soldiers killed themselves beside the pyre, not because they had harmed Vitellius or feared reprisals but from love of their emperor, and to follow his noble example Similar suicides became common afterwards at Bedriacum and Placentia and in other encampments An inconspicuous tomb was built for Otho, as being less a grievance even against the Gods for snatching me thus, so young, and before my time, from my parents, my children and my country ; but now that my days have been cut short by the guilty hands of Piso and Plancina, I leave my last prayers with you. Tell my father and my brother what cruel wrongs I have endured, by what artifices I have been beset : how I have ended a miserable life by a most unhappy death. Those who have shared my hopes—those who are near to me in blood—nay, even those who have envied me in life—will weep that one who had known such high fortunes, and had come safe through so many wars, should have perished by the treachery of a woman. It will be for you to lay complaint before the Senate, and invoke the law : for it is the first duty of a friend, not to follow the dead with idle lamentations to the grave, but to remember what he desired, to execute what he enjoined. Men who knew not Germanicus will lament him ; but if it was himself, rather than his fortunes, that you loved, you will avenge him. Shew to the people of Rome my wife, grand-daughter of the Divine Augustus ; count over to them our six children. Men's pity will be with the accusers ; and, if the accused plead that they were bidden to do the foul deed, none will believe, or, if they believe, forgive.

The friends swore, as they touched the dying man's right hand, that they would give up life sooner than revenge.

Germanicus then turned to his wife. He implored her by the love she bore him, and for their children's sake, to tame her high spirit, to bow beneath the stroke of fortune, and when she returned to Rome, not to anger those more powerful than herself by entering into rivalry with them. This he said openly ; he kept more for her private ear, bidding her beware, it was supposed, of Tiberius. Soon after that, he breathed his last, amid the profound sorrow of the Province and the surrounding peoples. Foreign nations also, and their kings, bewailed him ; so genial was he to friends, so courteous to foes. His looks and his speech alike commanded respect ; his manners had no arrogance, and provoked no ill-will ; yet they had all the dignity and distinction which befitted his high estate.

(Ann. ii. 71-2, tr. G. G. Ramsay.)

Agrippina, wife of Germanicus, starts for Rome carrying with her the ashes of her dead husband

MEANWHILE Agrippina, continuing her voyage over the winter seas without a break, arrived at Corcyra¹ an island which lies over against the coast of Calabria. Overwhelmed by a tempestuous grief which she knew not how to bear, she tarried there a few days to compose her spirits. During this interval, at the news of her approach, there was a rush of her intimate friends to Brundisium,² which was the nearest and safest port at which to land. Among the number were many officers who had served in various positions under Germanicus, many even who had never known him flocked in from the neighbouring towns, some as a matter of duty to the Emperor, some merely doing as others did.

When the fleet was first sighted in the offing not only the harbour and the adjoining parts of the beach, but also the city walls, the housetops, and every point which commanded a distant view out to sea, were thronged with a sorrowing crowd each man asking his neighbour whether they should receive Agrippina in silence when she landed or with speech of some sort. Before they could agree what best befitted the occasion, the fleet came slowly in. There was none of the usual alertness in the rowing, everything was arranged to betoken sorrow. And when Agrippina with her two children,³ stepped off the ship, carrying the funeral urn in her hands, and with her eyes fixed upon the ground one cry of grief hurst from the entire multitude, kinsfolk and strangers, men and women all lamenting alike, save that the grief of Agrippina's attendants was worn out by long continuance, while that of those who had come to meet her was the more fresh and strong.

The Emperor had sent an escort of two Praetorian Cohorts, and had ordered the magistrates of Calabria, Apulia and Campania to pay the last offices of respect to the memory of his son

¹ The modern Corfu

² The modern Brindisi

³ One of them was the future Emperor Caligula displeased his mother by showing attentions to the freed-woman Acte, Agrippina 'countered' by espousing the cause of Britannicus, the son of the late emperor Claudius, and, as such, perhaps a better claimant to the purple than Nero himself. Nero in consequence does away with Britannicus.

ALL this disquieted Nero ; and as the day was approaching when Britannicus would complete his fourteenth year he began to turn over in his mind now his mother's violent temper, now the character of Britannicus, which had recently revealed itself in a trifling incident which had won much favour for the young man.

During the feast of the Saturnalia,¹ among other youthful amusements, the game of choosing a king by lot was played. The lot had fallen on Nero. Upon the others he laid various commands of a harmless kind ; but when he bade Britannicus come forward and sing a song he thought to raise a laugh at the lad's expense, who was little used to feasts, even of a sober sort, much less to drunken orgies. Britannicus, however, with much composure, delivered himself of a poem in which was signified how he had been ousted from his father's house and from the Empire. The compassion thus aroused was the more unreservedly manifested that the incident occurred at night and at a time of frolic : Nero felt all the odium of the thing, and it intensified his hatred of Britannicus. Alarmed by Agrippina's threats, yet having no charge to advance against his brother, and not venturing openly to order his death, he resolved to proceed secretly, and ordered poison to be prepared. The agent of the crime was to be Pollio Julius, Tribune of a Praetorian Cohort, in whose custody was the notorious criminal called Locusta, who had been convicted of poisoning. Care had previously been taken that those near the person of Britannicus should be men devoid of all regard for right and loyalty.

The poison was first administered by his own governors ; but either because it was not deadly enough, or that it had been so diluted as not to act at once, it passed off in an evacuation. Impatient at the delay, Nero reprimanded the Tribune, and ordered the execution of Locusta —They were letting his safety wait, he said, in expectation of a popular outcry, while preparing a defence for themselves. Upon that they promised that the death should be as rapid as by the sword, and concocted a potion, close by Caesar's bedchamber, from poisons of known celerity.

¹ December 17-19 : a feast corresponding more or less to our Christmas.

Now it was the custom for the young princes to sit at a table of their own, less sumptuously provided along with other nobles of their own age, and there dine in sight of their relations. At this table sat Britannicus, and as there was a special attendant to taste his food and drink, the following device was resorted to, so as neither to omit the custom, nor yet betray the crime by causing the death of two persons. A cup without poison in it, previously tasted, but too hot to drink, was handed to Britannicus. Britannicus pushed it back as overheated upon which some cold water containing the poison was poured into it, and so rapidly did it permeate his whole system that speech and breathing at once failed him. The company were horrified those not in the secret fled. But those who knew more about it stayed on, rooted to their seats, with their eyes fixed on Nero. Nero never stirred from his couch, and as if knowing nothing, remarked —This was no unusual thing with Britannicus, he had been subject to fits of epilepsy from his infancy, he would soon recover sight and consciousness.

Agrippina's consternation, in spite of her command of countenance, showed plainly that she knew no more than the lad's own sister Octavia. She saw that her last help was gone, and here was an example of parricide before her eyes. Even Octavia, young as she was, had learnt to conceal her sorrows, her affections, and all her feelings.

After a short silence the festivity of the banquet was resumed. The body was burnt upon the same night, every preparation for the modest funeral had been made. The remains were laid in the Campus Martius, in a storm of rain so furious that the populace believed that the Gods were displaying their wrath at the crime. And yet most men were inclined to pardon it:—Brothers, they judged, had ever fallen out with brothers:¹ there could be no partners in an Empire.

(Ann. xiii. 15-17, tr. G. G. Ramsay.)

It needs a Tacitus to do justice to the story of Nero's murder of his mother, as a comparison of his version with that of Suetonius (itself powerful enough) will show. For a very effective English version the reader is referred to Stephen Philip's Nero.

NERO accordingly avoided private meetings with his mother, and commended her for seeking repose by retiring to her gardens, or to her country villas at Tusculum or Antium. But at last, convinced that wherever she might be she would be more than he could put up with, he resolved to make away with her. The only question was, Should it be by poison, or by the sword, or in some other way? At first, he resolved on poison: but now that Britannicus had died in that manner, it would be impossible to ascribe the event to chance if the poison were administered at the imperial table; it would be no easy thing to tamper with the attendants of one whose familiarity with crime kept her on the alert against plots; and she had fortified her system by prophylactics. No secret method of slaying her with the sword could be devised; and he was afraid that any one selected for so great a crime might refuse to obey the order.

At last an ingenious plan was proposed by the freedman Anicetus, commander of the fleet at Misenum. He had been Nero's attendant in boyhood; and there was mutual hatred between him and Agrippina. This man suggested that a vessel might be so constructed as to collapse at one part when out at sea, and throw Agrippina unawares into the water.

¹ Claudius's son, Britannicus, was born by his third wife, Messalina. After her death Claudius married Agrippina, who had already borne Nero to her first husband, Domitius.

That the deed might be done under cover of night, Nero invited her to dinner. Some information as to the plot, it seems, had reached her, and, being in doubt whether to believe it or not she made her way to Baiae in a litter. There her fears were allayed by Nero's caresses; he received her graciously, placed her above himself at table, and talked much with her, sometimes in a tone of boyish playfulness, sometimes gravely, as though making serious communications to her. The banquet was prolonged to a late hour; he ushered her out when she departed, and clung closely to her, eye to eye, and breast to breast—either by way of adding the finishing touch to his hypocrisy, or because even that ferocious soul lingered over the last look of a mother so soon to die.

The night was bright with stars and the sea unruffled, as though the Gods had provided for the exposure of the crime. Agrippina was accompanied by two of her intimate friends, Crepereius Gallus and Acerronia. The former was standing near the helm the latter was bending over the feet of Agrippina as she reclined upon a couch, talking happily to her of the change in her son's mood, and her own restoration to favour, when at a given signal, before the ship had gone very far, down came the canopy, which had been heavily weighted with lead, crushing Crepereius and killing him on the spot. Agrippina and Acerronia were saved by the projecting sides of the couch, which were strong enough to resist the weight falling on it, the ship failed to go to pieces, while amid the general confusion the majority, who knew nothing, interfered with those who were in the secret.

The sailors then attempted to upset the vessel by leaning over to one side, but in the scurry of the moment they failed to act together, some throwing their weight the wrong way, and so giving Agrippina the chance of falling gently into the water. Acerronia imprudently called out that she was Agrippina, crying Help! Help! save the mother of the Emperor! whereupon she was despatched by poles and oars and any naval weapons that came handy. Agrippina held her tongue, and thus escaping recognition, swam off, with nothing worse than a bruised shoulder: then falling in with some fishing-boats, she was conveyed to the Lucrine lake¹ and thence to her own villa.

Nero was waiting for news of the accomplishment of the crime when word was brought to him that Agrippina had escaped with a slight injury, but that the danger had come too near to leave her in any doubt as to its author. Half dead with terror, he kept repeating that, She might be coming at any moment in haste for vengeance: she might arm her slaves, or inflame the soldiery: or would she appear before the Senate and the people to denounce him for the shipwreck, the wound, and the killing of her friends? How could he help himself? Had Burrus or Seneca anything to suggest? For he had summoned them both out of bed: whether they had any previous knowledge of the plot is uncertain. Neither of them spoke for a while. Attempts to dissuade Nero might be useless: possibly they thought it had come to this, that his life depended upon his being beforehand with Agrippina.

Seneca at last had the courage to look at Burrus, and ask, Should the soldiers be ordered to kill her? Burrus replied that the Praetorians were devoted to the whole house of the Caesars: they cherished the memory of Germanicus, and would do no act of violence against any child of his. Let Anicetus carry through what he had promised.

Without a moment's hesitation Anicetus asked leave to complete the crime; on hearing which words Nero declared that, That was his first real day of Empire; and he had to thank his own freedman for the boon. Let him be off at once, taking men who would do what they were told.

Being now informed that Agerinus had arrived with a message from Agrippina, Nero had the face to get up a stage-scene on which to found an accusation against her. Throwing down a sword between the man's legs as he was delivering his message, ¹ Originally a lake, but converted in 37 B. C. into a harbour opening up into the main bay of Baiae.

he ordered him into chains as though caught in a criminal attempt he could thus concoct a story that his mother had sought his life and that she had made away with herself out of shame at being detected

Meanwhile the news of Agrippina's danger and the supposed accident had got abroad, every one, as he heard of it, ran down to the shore. Some clambered on to the jetties, others on to the nearest boats, some waded out as far as their stature permitted, some flung out their arms. the whole shore rang with prayers, shouts and lamentations, every one asking questions none knowing what to answer. A great multitude came up with torches. on being assured of Agrippina's safety, they were setting out to offer their congratulations when they were dispersed by an armed and menacing force which appeared upon the scene.

Anicetus posted guards round Agrippina's villa. He then broke open the door and hurried off such of the slaves as he met on his way to the door of her bed chamber. Here a few were standing who had not been frightened away with the rest. Inside there was a dim light, and a single female attendant. Agrippina was becoming more uneasy every moment at receiving no message from her son. even Agerinus had not returned. —Had all been going well she thought things would have worn another face. the solitude the sudden uproar, betokened some dire peril. Then the maid took herself off. What? she cried, art thou too deserting me? Hardly had she spoken when her eyes fell upon Anicetus, with whom were Herculesus a Trierarch, and Obaritus, a Centurion of marines. If he had come to visit her, she said he might take back word that she had recovered. but if it were to commit a crime she would not believe it of her son. he would never have ordered the murder of his mother.

The assassins closed round the bed. The first blow came from the Trierarch who struck her on the head with a bludgeon, and when the Centurion drew his sword for a death stroke Strike me here! she cried, thrusting out her womb and so perished under a multitude of blows.

So far all accounts agree. Some writers assert that Nero looked at his mother's dead body, and commended her beauty ; but this is denied by others. The body was burnt the same night, on a dining-couch, with scanty ceremony. No mound, no enclosure, marked the spot as long as Nero reigned ; but afterwards the members of Agrippina's household raised a low tumulus by the side of the road to Misenum, on the eminence from which the Dictator Caesar's villa looks out upon the bay below.

(Ann. xiv. 3-5, 7-9, tr. G. G. Ramsay.)

GAIUS SUETONIUS TRANQUILLUS is another Roman writer of whose life we have but little knowledge. He seems to have been born about the year A. D. 70, and to have died about 130. His father, as he tells us, was a Roman knight who fought in the first battle of Bedriacum. Suetonius himself seems to have taken no part in military or political life, except that he was for a time (if we may believe Spartianus, a late and not too truthful historian) a secretary of the emperor Hadrian. What we do know for certain is that he was a learned and studious man and a friend and contemporary of Pliny the Younger, in whose letters we find not a few mentions of him. That he was learned and studious we gather from a list of his writings preserved for us by the Greek lexicographer Suidas. These comprise books on history (or rather biography), antiquities, natural history, and grammar.

Suetonius, like Livy before him, was a storehouse for subsequent historians, but except for echoes and excerpts in the pages of such writers as Eutropius and Orosius the only works of his which survive are the Lives of Illustrious Men (in a fragmentary and contaminated condition) and the Lives of the Twelve Caesars. This last work, from which our illustrations are taken, covers the period from Julius Caesar to Domitian, who died in A. D. 96.

From a historical point of view the Lives of the Caesars are a strange mixture of good and bad. There is no doubt that Suetonius preferred an amusing anecdote to a historical fact—hence a multitude of such stories as that in our first extract. The clades Variana (see above, p. 424), on the other hand, is dismissed with a few words. There is no doubt, too, that his anecdote at times comes perilously near to mere scandal mongering and that modern taste shudders at much of his detail Still on the whole there is a grasp of subject and a vividness of treatment about Suetonius's biographical work—let alone an interest of material—which have more than justified his survival

The translation is again that of Philemon Holland

Caligula raises the wind A new way to pay old debts

HAVING published an open port sale of the residue remaining of furniture provided to set out all shews and games, he caused the said parcels to be brought forth and sold setting the prices thereof himselfe and enhaunsing the same to such a prick, that some men enforced to buye certaine things at an extreame and exceeding rate (whereby they were empoverished and stript of all their goods) cut their owne veines and so bled to death Well known it is that whiles APOCIUS SATURNIVUS tooke a nap and slept among the seats and stauls where these sales were held Cæsar put the Bedell in mind not to let slip and overpasse such an honorable person of Pretours degree as he was considering, quoth he, that with his head he had so often nodded and made signes unto him, and thus taking that occasion, he never rested raising the price whiles he sat and nodded stil, untill there were fastened upon the man (ignorant, God wote, altogether of any such matter) thirteene sword fensers, at nine millians of Sesterces

(Div Calig 38 4)

Suetonius's descriptions of his characters' physical appearance are particularly happy Here is a thumb-nail sketch of Caligula The abnormality not to say insanity, of the emperor comes out strongly in this chapter For the picture of an even madder Caligula see the brilliant monologue by G W Stevens in his Monologues of the Dead

OF Stature hee was very tall pale and wan coloured of body grosse and without all good making his necke and shanks exceeding slender his eyes sunke in his head, and his temples hollow, his forehead broad, and the same furrowed and frowning : the haire of his head growing thinne, and none at all about his crowne : in all parts else hairie he was and shagged. It was therefore taken for an hainous and capitall offence, either to looke upon him as he passed by from an higher place, or once but to name a Goate upon any occasion whatsoever. His face and visage being naturally sterne and grim, hee made of purpose more crabbed and hideous : composing and dressing it at a looking-glasse all manner of waies to seeme more terrible and to strike greater feare. He was neither healthfull in body nor stode sound in minde ; Being a child, much troubled with the falling sicknesse. In his youth, patient of labour and travaile : yet so, as that ever and anone upon a suddaine fainting that came uppon him, he was scarce able to goe, to stand, to arise, to recover himselfe and to beare up his head. The infirmitie of his minde, both himselfe perceived, and oftentimes also was minded to goe aside (unto Anticyra), there to purge his braine throughly. It is for certaine thought, that poysoned he was with a Potion given unto him by his wife CÆSONIA : Which in deede was a love medicine, but such an one, as crackt his wits and enraged him. He was troubled most of all with want of sleepe ; For, he slept not above three houres in a night : and in those verily hee tooke no quiet repose, but fearefull ; and skared with strange illusions and fantastical imaginations : as who among the rest dreamed upon a time that hee saw the very forme and resemblance of the sea talking with him. And heereupon for a great part of the night, what with tedious wakefulnesse and wearinesse of lying, one while sitting up in his bed, another while roaming and wandering too and fro in his Galleries (which were of an exceeding length), hee was wont to call upon and looke still for the day-light.

(Div. Calig. 50.)

The death of Nero.

WHEN as each one called then instantly on every side upon him, to deliver him selfe with all speede from the reproachfull contumelies and abuses, whereto hee was hourelly subiect, he commaunded a grave to be made before his face, and gave a measure therefore according to the iust proportion of his body and therewith, if any peeces of marble stone might be found about the house, to be laid in order That water also and wood¹ should bee gotten together for his dead body to be washed anone therewith weeping at every word he spake, and inserting ever and anone this pittifull speech Qualis artifex pereo! What an excellent Artisane am I! and yet nowe must I die Whiles some stay was made about these complements, PHAONS² Courrier brought certaine letters which hee intercepted and snatcht out of his hands And reading therein that hee had his Dome by the Senate, To be an Enemie to the State That he was laid for all about to be punished *More maiorum*³ More maiorum! quoth he, what kinde of punishment is that! and when he understoode, it implied thus much, That the man so condemned should be stript all naked, his head locked fast in a forke and his body scourged with rods to death, he was so terrified therewith That hee caught up two daggers which hee had brought with him and trying the points of them both how sharpe they were, he put them up againe, making this excuse That the fatalle houre of his death was not yet come And one while he exhorted SORUS⁴ to begin for to lament, weepe and wale another while he intreated hard That some one of them would kill him selfe first and by his example helpe him to take his death Sometime also he checked and blamed his owne timorousnesse in these wordes I live shamefully and in reproach Verily it becomes not NERO, it becomes him not In such cases as these hee had neede to bee wise and sober Goe to, man plucke up thy heart and rouse thy selfe Nowe by this time approached the Horsemen neere at hand, who had a warrant and precept to bring him alive Which when hee perceived after hee had with trembling and quaking uttered this verse

*The trampling noise of horses swift resoundeth in mine eares*⁵

¹ For washing and then burning the body

² In the manner of our ancestors

³ A quotation from Homer

⁴ A freed man

⁵ A minion of Nero

He set a dagger to his throat, whiles EPAPHRODITUS his Secretarie lent him his hand to dispatch him. When he was yet but halfe dead, a Centurion brake in upon him, and putting his cloake upon the wound, made semblance as if hee came to aide and succour him : Vnto whom he answered nothing but this. Too late. And is this your loyaltie and allegiance? In which very words he yeilded up his breath, with his eyes staring out and set in his head, to the great feare and horroure of all that were present.

(Div. Ner. 49.)

ORATORY

THE one Roman orator, whose speeches have come down to us, is Cicero. He lived in the last century of the Roman Republic, when oratory had, as we shall see, reached a high level. But from the account which he has himself given us in his dialogue, the Brutus, we are able to trace something of the history of its development and we can supplement this with a few fragments which have been preserved almost by accident.

As far back as the fourth century B. C. oratory was recognized as an art—as something more than mere speaking—and we are told that the great Censor, Appius Claudius Caecus (c. 312 B. C.), had a high reputation. Cicero says that even in his day some of his funeral orations were still extant and greatly admired. But the first name to which we are able to attach any definite character is that of MARCUS PORCIUS CATO THE ELDER (died 149 B. C.). He was the lifelong opponent of the imported Greek learning, yet, if we may judge from Cicero's comments, he did not altogether escape from the new feeling for style which the knowledge of Greek models had brought to Rome. In a fragment from a speech of his, in which he is defending himself against a charge of extravagance in his province, uncouth and jerky as it is, we can recognize an early attempt at parallelism and antithesis. It is not easy to reproduce the effect of the Latin in English, but it might run something like this:

I ORDERED the book to be produced, in which was written my speech on the matter on which I had made a wager with Marcus Cornelius. The record was produced. The benefactions of my ancestors were recited and there was read what I had done for the State. After both of these had been read through, there were then written in my speech the words 'I never squandered money on bribery, neither my own nor that of our subjects. No, no, don't write that, I exclaimed, they do not wish to hear that.' Then he recited, 'I never placed officers in the cities of your subjects to plunder their property.' Erase that too, they do not wish to hear it. Read on. 'I never divided spoil

He set a dagger to his throat, whiles EPAPHRODITUS his Secretarie lent him his hand to dispatch him. When he was yet but halfe dead, a Centurion brake in upon him, and putting his cloake upon the wound, made semblance as if hee came to aide and succour him: Vnto whom he answered nothing but this. Too late. And is this your loyaltie and allegeance? In which very words he yeelded up his breath, with his eyes staring out and set in his head, to the great feare and horroure of all that were present.

(Div. Ner. 49.)

ORATORY

THE one Roman orator, whose speeches have come down to us, is Cicero. He lived in the last century of the Roman Republic, when oratory had, as we shall see, reached a high level. But from the account which he has himself given us in his dialogue, the Brutus, we are able to trace something of the history of its development, and we can supplement this with a few fragments which have been preserved almost by accident.

As far back as the fourth century B. C. oratory was recognized as an art—as something more than mere speaking—and we are told that the great Censor, Appius Claudius Caecus (c. 312 B. C.), had a high reputation. Cicero says that even in his day some of his funeral orations were still extant and greatly admired. But the first name to which we are able to attach any definite character is that of MARCUS PORCIUS CATO THE ELDER (died 149 B. C.). He was the lifelong opponent of the imported Greek learning, yet, if we may judge from Cicero's comments, he did not altogether escape from the new feeling for style which the knowledge of Greek models had brought to Rome. In a fragment from a speech of his, in which he is defending himself against a charge of extravagance in his province, uncouth and jerky as it is, we can recognize an early attempt at parallelism and antithesis. It is not easy to reproduce the effect of the Latin in English, but it might run something like this.

I ORDERED the book to be produced in which was written my speech on the matter on which I had made a wager with Marcus Cornelius. The record was produced. The benefactions of my ancestors were recited, and there was read what I had done for the State. After both of these had been read through, there were then written in my speech the words 'I never squandered money on bribery, neither my own nor that of our subjects. No, no, don't write that, I exclaimed, they do not wish to hear that. Then he recited 'I never placed officers in the cities of your subjects to plunder their property.' Erase that too, they do not wish to hear it. Read on. 'I never divided spoil passion, but was normally less strained and less self-conscious. Ten years later, in 70 B.C., he had entered upon public life and had held the office of quaestor, or financial officer, in Sicily. After he had left the island the Sicilians had suffered three years of unparalleled oppression at the hands of the governor, Caius Verres. When Verres went out of office at the end of 71 B.C. the Sicilians begged Cicero to undertake his prosecution for extortion. The trial came on in August 70 B.C., and Cicero, in order to defeat the procrastinating tactics of his opponents, contented himself with a short speech and called his evidence. The effect was overwhelming: Hortensius abandoned the defence and Verres fled into exile. Cicero then published a tremendous indictment in five books which he might have delivered and which we possess in full. From this we may take two characteristic passages. In the first he is describing with an almost playful irony the manner in which Verres spent his years as governor. The smooth, easy narrative and the cynical touches are very different from the white-hot earnestness of the speech for Roscius.

NOW let me tell you to begin with, gentlemen, how easy and pleasant, thanks to his careful planning, he made the duty of travelling about his province, a duty which is of the first importance for a military governor and is particularly necessary in Sicily. First of all during the winter months he invented this brilliant antidote for the excessive cold and the violence of storms and torrents. He selected the town of Syracuse, whose natural situation and climate are said to be so beautiful that not a single day passes, however wild and stormy, on which the sun is not seen at some time or other. Here that model governor used to live during the winter months, and it was not easy to see him, I will not say out of doors, but even out of bed: the short day was occupied by banquets, the long night by vice and debauchery.

But when spring came—and, mark you, he did not reckon its beginning by the arrival of the west wind or by any particular constellation, but he used to hold that spring was coming as soon as he saw a rose—he would devote himself to his toilsome marches, and on them his endurance and energy did not permit him to be seen on horseback. For he used to be carried along like the old kings of Bithynia in a large litter, in which there was a cushion of transparent Maltese linen stuffed with roses. He wore a wreath on his head and another round his neck, and from time to time lifted to his nostrils a sachet of the finest cambric marked with tiny spots and filled with rose-petals. Having thus accomplished his march when he arrived at a town he would be carried still in the litter straight to his bedroom. There as you have heard from many witnesses on oath Sicilian magistrates and Roman knights would come to visit him. disputes were put before him in secret, and shortly afterwards his decisions were publicly carried away. After he had spent a little time in his bedroom laying down the law not by justice but for bribes he thought that the remainder of his time might fairly be given to the deities of love and wine.

Then came the height of summer, the season which all other governors of Sicily have been accustomed to spend in travelling, thinking no doubt that the best time for going about the province is when the corn is on the threshing floor, then the farm labourers are gathered together, it is easy to see how many slaves there are and the work is at its busiest. the abundance of the crops is an inducement for travel and the season suggests no difficulty. Yet at this very time, when other praetors are making their journeys this up-to-date governor used to pitch a permanent camp in the most lovely spot in Syracuse. At the very entrance to the harbour, just where the coastline curves in from the open sea towards the city, he would place his canvas tent. Here he moved from the governor's house which was formerly King Hiero's palace, and all through the summer he was never seen outside the favoured spot. During those days while Verres dressed in a scarlet cloak and a long tunic, was spending his time in banquets with women no one was offended or annoyed that the magistrate was not to be found in his court that the law was not administered nor trials held. they cared not at all if that spot on the shore rang with the voices of women and the singing of choruses, while in the forum there was never a whisper of pleading or judgement : for it was not justice and the law which were then absent from the forum, but violence and tyranny together with cruel and shameless plundering of property.

(In Verr. II. v. 10. 26.)

In the next passage we have a rather higher tone of indignation. There had been an affair with some pirates, in which the Sicilian navy, owing largely, as Cicero suggests, to the inadequate equipment which Verres had given it, had been disgraced. Verres condemned the captains of the ships and imprisoned them with a refinement of cruelty. There is irony here too, but it is of a tenser quality.

THE condemned captains are thrown into prison. Punishment is meted out to them, and exacted from their wretched parents : they are forbidden to visit their sons, forbidden to bring their own children food and clothing. Their fathers, whom you see before you, lay prostrate at the prison door, their poor mothers passed the night at the gate excluded from looking on their children for the last time : yet they asked nothing more than permission to catch their sons' last breath on their lips.. In front of them was the prison warder, the governor's executioner, who struck death and terror into the hearts of Sicilians and citizens of Rome alike, the lictor Sextius, and he exacted a fixed tariff for every sigh and groan. 'To go in', said he, 'costs so much, to take in food, so much.' No one could refuse. 'Well,' he added, 'what will you give me to insure that your son is killed at the first blow? To save him from long torture, from more than one blow of the axe, in short from a painful death?' Even for this purpose money had to be given to the lictor. What great and unbearable pain is this! What a weight of bitter misfortune! The parents were compelled to purchase for their children, not life, but a speedy death. Even the young men themselves would talk to their warder Sextius about their execution and beg for the one swift blow, the last prayer the sons made to their parents was to give the lictor money, to lighten their torture. Many cruel sufferings were devised for the parents and relations; many indeed, but it might be supposed that their sons' death would end them. Not so. Can cruelty go any further? Yes, a way can be found for when they have been beheaded or put to death their bodies will be thrown to the beasts. If the parents find this distressing they must purchase the right to bury them. You have heard Onasus, a distinguished citizen of Segesta, say that he paid money to Verres' creature Timarchides for the burial of the captain Heracleus. You cannot say, Verres, 'It is only parents angry at the loss of their sons who come before us' for this is the evidence of an eminent man of the highest rank, and he is not speaking of his own son. There was no one in Syracuse at the time who had not heard, who did not know, that even the prisoners themselves had to bargain thus with Timarchides for their burial. They spoke to Timarchides in public, all their relations were brought in to hear them, the price of their funerals was openly fixed while they were still alive.

(In Verr II v 48 117)

The successful prosecution of Verres left Cicero the acknowledged leader of the Roman Bar and henceforward Hortensius had often to be content with appearing as his junior. This meant also the victory of Cicero's modified Greek style over his rival's Asianism. His manner and methods were indeed now formed, and we shall try simply to observe them in practice on different themes and in different circumstances. In theory Cicero believed in the combination of three styles recognized as distinct by Greek writers: the 'grand' style was to be used in vehement passages for swaying the minds of the audience, the 'plain' style for legal argument, and between them a 'middle' or 'moderate' style for narrative.

A typical example of the last may be taken from the speech For Cluentius, whom Cicero had to defend in 66 B.C. The main charge was one of poisoning, but the prosecutor had made great capital out of an accusation that Cluentius had procured the condemnation of his stepfather, Oppricus, in a previous trial by bribing the jury. Cicero gives a long and humorous account of the trial, the object of which is to show that the bribery was, if anything, on the other side and had been conducted by an unscrupulous person called Staienus. In reading the passage it is perhaps of interest to know that after the acquittal of Cluentius Cicero boasted that he had 'thrown dust in the eyes of the jury'.

SEEING the now desperate position of Oppianicus, whom the two previous verdicts had left without a leg to stand on, Staienus roused him from his despondency by the promises he made, and bade him withal never despair of deliverance. Oppianicus, on his part, began to implore the rascal to point out to him some way of bribing the jury; on which he told him, as Oppianicus afterwards informed us, that there was not a man in the country who could do it 'except myself'. But at first he began to make difficulties; he was standing for the aedileship, he said, against men of the highest rank, and he was afraid of incurring unpopularity and discredit. His scruples were subsequently overcome; and after beginning by demanding an immense sum of money he came down in the end to a negotiable figure, and bade Oppianicus send to his house six hundred and forty thousand sesterces. As soon as this sum was brought to him, the dirty scoundrel began to indulge in thoughts and reflexions of this sort: 'Nothing could suit my interests better than that Oppianicus should be convicted. If he is acquitted, I shall either have to distribute this money among the jurors, or else give it back to him; whereas if he is found guilty there will be no one to recover it.' So he bethinks himself of a remarkable device. Gentlemen, you will more readily credit the true statement I am making if you will have the goodness to go back a considerable space, and recall to mind the life and disposition of Gaius Staienus; for it is just the opinion we have of the character of an individual that enables us to determine what his conduct may or may not have been.

Being necessitous and extravagant, audacious, cunning, and treacherous, and seeing such a large sum of money deposited in his wretched, poverty-stricken lodgings, he began to turn his mind to all sorts of roguery and fraud. 'Shall I give it to the jurors? If I do, what shall I gain for myself save danger and disgrace? Can't I hit on some way of making Oppianicus's conviction inevitable? What if some accident (nothing in this world is impossible) should deliver him from danger: should I not have to give it up? Well, he is tottering on the brink, let us tip him over—he is done for, let us give him the finishing stroke.' The plan he took was to promise money to certain unprincipled jurors, and afterwards to keep it to himself, for he thought that the men of character among them would of their own accord deal rigorously with the case, and his object was to make those of less principle enraged with Oppianicus for having played them false. So, with his usual wrongheadedness and reversal of the proper order of things, he begins with Bulbus. Finding him in low spirits and inclined to yawn, because it was long since he had made any money he gives him a playful poke. 'I say Bulbus,' says he 'will you stand in with me, so that you and I may not serve our country for naught?' As soon as he heard the words 'not for naught', Bulbus exclaims, 'I'll follow wherever you like to lead, but what's your game?' Thereupon Staienus promises him forty thousand sesterces in the event of Oppianicus's acquittal, and asks him to approach the others with whom he was in the habit of gossiping. He himself, the contriver and cooker-up of the whole scheme, goes on to sprinkle a drop of Gutta seasoning on his vegetable friend Bulbus¹, after which Bulbus was not thought at all a bitter pill by those whose palates had been tickled by a titbit of promise from what he said to them. One day passed, and then another and the matter still seemed rather unsettled, there was no appearance of an intermediary agent, or security for the payment of the money. On this Bulbus, looking quite sprightly, accosts the fellow in his most insinuating manner. 'Holloa Paetus—for this was the surname which Staienus had chosen for himself from the illustrious house of the Aeli lest if he called himself a Ligur² he might be thought to be using a tribal rather than a family surname—'Holloa, Paetus,' says he, 'about that business of which you spoke to me; they are asking me where the money is.' Then did this unconscionable impostor, gorged with the gain he made in courts of justice, and already brooding in hope and imagination on the money which he had stowed away, begin to knit his brows. Call to mind his features and the unreal and hypocritical look he used to wear. He complains that Oppianicus has played him false! He, who was one huge piece of roguery and falsehood, and who by zealous application and a sort of knavish craft had given an additional flavour to the vices with which nature had endowed him, roundly asserts that Oppianicus has defrauded him, and says moreover, to prove it, that, in the open voting which was to be the order of the day, he would give his vote for a conviction!

¹ A typical Ciceronian pun. Gutta means a drop and Bulbus an onion.

² Ligur was a cognomen of the family of the Aeli, the Ligurians were proverbially untrustworthy.

(Pro Cluentio, 25. 68, tr. Peterson.)

So far we have seen Cicero as the advocate in the law courts. Now we may make his acquaintance as a politician. In 63 B.C. he attained the highest civic dignity of the consulship and found himself confronted with a conspiracy against the State, whose importance he probably magnified, led by some reckless young aristocrats with the notorious Catiline at their head. Cicero set about to expose and suppress the conspiracy. On November 7 some attempt was made to assassinate him, and on the following day Cicero delivered in the Senate the First Catilinarian Oration, in which he explained Catiline's intentions and urged him to leave Rome. We may take the peroration of this speech as an example of Cicero's use of the 'grand' manner: Dr. Blakiston's translation admirably brings out its dignity and gravity.

TOO long indeed, my lords, have we been environed by this perilous and treacherous conspiracy; but it has chanced that all these crimes, all this ancient recklessness and audacity, has matured at last and has burst with full force upon the year of my consulship. If then out of the whole gang this single brigand only is removed, we shall perhaps for a brief period think ourselves relieved from anxiety and alarm. But the real peril will only have been driven under the surface; it will still lurk deep in the veins and vital organs of the State. As men stricken with a serious disease when they lie hot and tossing with fever, often seem to be relieved at first by a draught of cold water, but afterwards are much more seriously and violently attacked, so this disease which has infected the State, may be relieved by the punishment of Catiline, but will oppress it with greater violence if the others survive. Let the disloyal then withdraw, let them separate themselves from the loyal, let them herd together in one place, let there be a wall as I have often said to segregate them from us. Let them cease to plot the assassination of the Consul in his own house, let them cease to mass their forces round the city praetor's tribunal, let them cease to beleaguer the Senate house with drawn swords and to prepare their grenades and matches for firing the city. In short, let the political principles of every man be visibly written upon his countenance. I promise you this my lords that in me and my colleague there shall be found such energy in you yourselves such leadership in the Roman knights such courage, in all loyal men such unanimity, that by Catiline's departure from Rome you shall see everything that is evil exposed to searching light and suppressed by adequate punishment.

With these fateful words Catiline, to the true preservation of the State to the wreck and ruin of yourself and to the destruction of those who have banded themselves with you in every sort of crime and treason get you gone to your unholy and abominable campaign. Then shalt thou great Jupiter who wast established by Romulus with the same religious rites as this city, thou whom we name rightly the Stablisher of this city and empire keep this man and his associates far from the fanes and from the other temples far from the buildings and walls of the city, far from the lives and fortunes of all the citizens, and these men who hate the loyal who make war on their country and pillage Italy who are linked together by bonds of guilt and by complicity in crime thou shalt afflict in life and in death with torments that will never cease.

(In Cat., 1. 13-31, tr. Blakiston.)

The conspiracy was successfully unmasked : some of Catiline's associates were arrested in Rome and, after a famous debate in the Senate, executed on Cicero's recommendation ; Catiline himself was defeated in battle early the next year at Pistoria (near Florence) by Cicero's colleague in the consulship, Marcus Antonius.¹ But towards the end of 63 B.C. Catiline's party seem to have made an expiring effort to unseat the Consul-elect, Lucius Murena, on a charge of bribery. Cicero, perhaps exalted by his success, digresses even more in this speech than was his wont in the law-courts, and the extract given below is taken from a long digression in which he twits his opponent, Marcus Cato, with his Stoic principles. It is again an example of his humorous and ironic manner, and is interesting to us as showing how far irrelevance was permitted in a legal speech at Rome : it also gives us a glimpse of Cicero the philosopher.

SINCE I have not to speak here in an unlearned assembly or at a meeting of country-folk, I will discuss with some freedom those humane studies which are known and appreciated both by myself and by you. You must realize, gentlemen, that those unique and inspired qualities which we all recognize in Marcus Cato are due to his own character : if at any time we feel something lacking in him, we must attribute the want not to his nature but to his training. There was once a man named Zeno, a teacher of great distinction, the followers of whose system are called Stoics. His ideas and his maxims are on these lines : that a wise man is never touched by personal influence and never forgives a sin ; that no one but a fool or a knave shows pity ; that it is unmanly to listen to an appeal or to be placated ; that the wise alone can be beautiful, however misshapen they may be, rich, however indigent, kings, even if they are in slavery ; but us who are not wise they call runaways, exiles, enemies or even lunatics. They hold that all sins are equal ; every mistake is an infamous crime, and it is an equal misdeed to strangle a barndoor fowl unnecessarily and to strangle one's own father ; the wise man, they say, has no opinions, never repents, never makes a mistake, never changes his opinion.

All this our quick-witted friend, Marcus Cato, eagerly seized

¹ See p. 401.

from the teaching of learned philosophers, not for purposes of debate, as most men do, but as precepts for life. Suppose the tax farmers made a request; mind that personal claims have no weight. Suppose some wretched victims of misfortune come to present their petition—you'll be guilty of the vilest crime, says he, if you act in the least degree under the influence of pity. Suppose a man confesses his misdeed and seeks pardon, 'it's a sin to pardon a crime.' But it was only a trifling error—'all sins are on a level.' If you have once said a thing it is fixed and unalterable. Suppose you were influenced not by facts but by common opinion—'the philosopher knows no opinions. If you tell him he has made a mistake, he regards it as libel. From this school of thought we get arguments of this kind—'I declared in the Senate that I would prosecute a certain candidate for the consulship. But you spoke in anger—'The philosopher,' he replies, 'is never angry.' But it was said on the spur of the moment. Only a shameless man, he says, will tell a lie. It is disgraceful to change one's opinion—a crime to listen to an appeal—a sin to show pity.

But my school—for I admit, Cato, that I too in my young days distrusted my own judgement and looked for the assistance of philosophy—my school I say, the followers of Plato and Aristotle, being moderate and reasonable beings, hold that personal considerations ought sometimes to have weight with the philosopher, that a good man does show pity, that there are different degrees of wrong-doing and that punishment must vary accordingly, that a consistent man may yet pardon, that even the philosopher often holds an opinion when he does not know, that he is sometimes angry, that he can hear an appeal and be appeased, that he sometimes alters what he has said, if he sees it is right to do so, that he occasionally abandons his opinion, and that all virtue is in a sense a mean. If chance had led you Cato, with all your great gifts, to such masters as these, it is true you would not have been a better or braver man nor more self-controlled or just—for that you cannot be—but you would have been a little more ready to be merciful.

(Pro Murena, 29-61.)

One gem of a different style must be quoted from this period of Cicero's career. In 62 B. C. he was called upon to defend the poet Archias, who was accused of usurping the rights of citizenship. The greater portion of a very brief speech is occupied with a consideration of the value of poetry and literature. Just before the famous passage to be quoted, Cicero has argued that it is poets who have preserved the glory of heroes. Now he asks what is the value of literature itself.

SOME one will ask, perhaps: what about the great men themselves whose deeds are immortalized in literature? Were they trained in this art which you extol so highly? It is not easy to state as much about all of them, but I know what answer I can give. I admit that there have been many men of conspicuous courage and valour, who without any training, by a natural—I might almost say a divine—instinct, have of their own accord possessed self-control and seriousness of aim: I will go further and say that nature without education has more often produced valour and renown than education without nature. Yet I maintain that when to a great and brilliant nature there is added methodical training in literature the result is a unique and indefinable pre-eminence. Among those who have attained it are the heroic Africanus, who was known to our fathers, and Caius Laelius and Lucius Furius, men with perfect self-restraint and moderation, and that brave man of prodigious learning in his time, Marcus Cato the Elder: certainly, if they had not been helped by literature towards the attainment and practice of virtue, they would never have devoted their time to studying it. And even if we could not point to results so valuable as these, if it were merely enjoyment that was sought in such pursuits, still, I take it, you would consider a recreation like this humane and liberal. Other enjoyments are not suited to all seasons, all times of life, all places; the study of literature stimulates us in boyhood, delights us in old age, is an ornament in prosperity, a comfort and a refuge in adversity, a joy at home, no hindrance abroad; it helps us through a sleepless night, it goes with us on our travels and is our companion in the country.

(Pro Archia, 7. 15.)

The next year or two were used by Cicero in endeavouring to cement and perpetuate the party of the aristocrats, or optimates (best men), as he loves to call them, but the formation in 60 B. C. of the informal coalition between Caesar, Pompey, and Crassus known as the First Triumvirate, upset his plans. Caesar and Pompey were really playing against one another for a despotism, which was subversive of the old senatorial government. Cicero refused to be cajoled by them and showed such opposition that the triumvirs were obliged to secure his exile. In 58 B. C. he spent a miserable year in Macedonia, and returning in the summer of the next year he made the mistake of assuming that things were as he left them. In a speech For Sestius delivered in 56 B. C. he almost openly renewed his opposition to the triumvirs and strove to rally the aristocratic party. The following passage gives his conception of the functions and ideals of a 'conservative' party, and is not without significance even in these days.

THERE have always been in this State two classes of those who have made it their object to engage in political life and to win distinction in it. Of these classes the one preferred to be called the popular party, the other the aristocrats—and both strove to act up to their name. Those who wished their words and actions to find favour with the people were called the popular party, those who strove to win for their policy the approval of the best citizens were called the aristocrats. Who then are these 'best citizens'? As far as numbers go, if that is what you mean, their name is legion—for otherwise we could not hold our own. There are leaders of public opinion and those who follow their lead, there are men of the highest ranks of society, who have a prescriptive right to a seat in the House, there are inhabitants of the boroughs and country gentlemen, there are merchants and even freedmen in the ranks of the aristocrats. As far as numbers go, as I have said, the class is spread far and wide. But, to remove all misapprehension, the whole class may be comprised in a short definition. He is an aristocrat who does no harm to the State, is not naturally immoral and criminal, and is not involved in private difficulties. And so it turns out that those whom you called a 'gang' are all who are sound in heart and limb and have a happy home. Those who follow their wishes, interests and opinions in governing the State are counted the champions of the aristocrats—or rather staunch aristocrats themselves and distinguished citizens, leaders in fact of the State. What then is the guiding-star of these helmsmen of the State, on which they must keep their eyes and by which they must steer their course? It is that which is the heart's desire of all sound good and happy men—peace with honour. All those who desire this end are aristocrats, and those who secure it are considered great men and the saviours of the State; for in its administration men should neither be such slaves to honour that they do not provide for peace, nor yet enamoured of any form of peace which is inconsistent with honour.

These are the roots of this 'Peace with Honour', which our leaders must preserve and defend even at the risk of life; these are its branches: the ceremonies of religion, the auspices, the powers of the magistrates, the authority of the Senate, our laws and traditions, the law-courts and the pronouncements of the judges, good faith, our colonies and subject-states, the glory of our empire, the art of war, the stability of finance. To be the defender and champion of all these sacred things needs a great heart, a great mind, great patriotism. For indeed in a State so large as ours there is always a great number of persons who either through fear of punishment and their own guilty conscience are driven to seek revolution and an upheaval of the constitution, or because of some innate mental aberration thrive on civil discord and dissension, or else because of their financial difficulties prefer to perish in a general conflagration rather than by themselves. And when such men find leaders and instigators to their vicious aims, then storms run high in the State, and those who have claimed to hold the helm of their country's fortunes must keep close watch and strive with all the knowledge and devotion they possess to preserve those roots and those branches of which I spoke just now, to hold on their course and make for the haven of peace and honour. If, gentlemen, I were to deny that this path is rough and steep and beset with traps and dangers, I should speaking false for indeed I have not only known this always, but I have myself experienced it more than any other man

There are always larger forces ready to attack than to defend the State. Reckless and abandoned men are set in motion by a nod, often indeed they rise of their own accord against the State, but loyal citizens are for some reason slower to move. They neglect things at first, and at last, when they are moved by sheer necessity, it sometimes happens through their hesitation and procrastination that, while they wish to preserve peace even at the cost of honour, they lose both alike. Then those who wished to be the champions of the State if they are not in earnest give up the task, if they are faint hearted they run away few remain at their post and endure all things for the good of the State. They are men like your father, Marcus Scaurus, who resisted every revolutionary from Caius Gracchus to Quintus Varius, and was never shaken by violence, by threats, by unpopularity, like Quintus Metellus your great uncle, who as censor dared to condemn Lucius Saturninus then at the height of his popularity, and would not place Gracchus, the Pretender, on the census roll in spite of the fury of an excited mob, and when at last he alone had refused to swear obedience to a law which he believed was illegally passed he preferred to abandon his country rather than his opinion, and went into exile. Or, if I may leave examples in history, which are as numerous as the glory of our empire can require and yet not mention the names of the living such a man within our own recollection was Quintus Catulus, whom neither the blasts of danger nor the breath of success could ever through hope or fear deflect from the course which he had chosen.

Let these be your pattern, in heaven's name if you would seek for honour, for praise, for glory! These are noble, divine, immortal they are crowned with fame, they are enshrined in the records of history, they are handed down to future generations. It is a toilsome path I own there are great dangers, I admit. Well has the poet said

Full many a snare besets the good man's path

yet, as he adds,

'tis folly to demand
What many crave and many view askance,
Unless with all thy heart and all thy might Thou'lt bear the heavy burden to the end.

(Pro Sestio, 45. 96.)

During the years that followed, events were moving rapidly towards civil war. Caesar was gathering his forces during his great campaigns in Gaul, and Pompey was almost helplessly awaiting his return in Rome, allying himself more and more with the constitutional party. In Rome itself there had been great disorders, and armed gangs, representing different interests, often engaged in bloody conflicts in the streets and in the Forum. The chief leaders of these gangs were Clodius, the tribune who had secured Cicero's exile, and Milo, one of the tribunes who promoted his recall. On January 18, 52 B. C., these two met accidentally on the road a few miles from Rome, and in the fracas which resulted Clodius was killed. A special court was appointed to try Milo, and Cicero undertook to defend him. At the critical moment the sight of Pompey's armed soldiers unnerved him and he broke down, but he had prepared an elaborate speech which he afterwards published. The extract here given is once again in the 'grand' manner and deals with the providence 'in the affairs of man'.

BUT the gratitude which is due from you for this benefit, gentlemen of the jury, is claimed by the Fortune of Rome, by the good luck of your own generation and by the immortal powers. Nor can any one entertain any other view, unless he is a man who holds that there is no divine force or providence at all, who is not impressed by the greatness of our empire or by the sun above us, or by the movements of the heavenly bodies, or by the regular succession of the seasons, or even by what is greatest of all, the wisdom of our ancestors who themselves honoured most piously and handed down to us their descendants these cults and ceremonies and religious observances. There exists, assuredly there exists, a Divine Power; nor is it conceivable that there is in these frail bodies of ours an active and sentient principle and none in the vast and magnificent operations of nature. Unless perhaps men think it does not exist because it is not observed and distinguished by our eyes as if indeed we could see and perceive by the senses the exact nature and seat of that mental faculty which gives us knowledge and foresight and the power of speech and action at the present moment. It was then that Power the same power which has often conferred amazing blessings and benefits on this city which crushed and trampled on that deadly monster in that it originally inspired him with the idea of daring to irritate by violence and openly challenge the bravest of men thus incurring defeat from the one man whose defeat would have secured for him a perpetual immunity and licence for crime. No human wisdom nor even any ordinary act of Providence brought about that result. The holy places themselves which saw that brute overthrown must have aroused themselves and asserted their rights in dealing with him. For to you now ye hills and groves of Alba to you I say I appeal and call and to you ye ruined altars of the Albans as old and as sacred as the cults of the Roman people ye altars whom Clodius in his reckless insanity after selling and devastating the most sacred groves had smothered with his crazy basenient works it was your sanctities that then had potency your power prevailed which he had profaned with every kind of crime and then from thy lofty mount of Latium holy Jupiter whose lakes and groves and precincts he had stained with every sort of abominable and criminal debauchery thou didst at last awake to inflict punishment on him. By you are those penalties exacted by all of you and in your sight penalties deferred indeed but just and well deserved.

(Pro Milone 30 83 tr Blakiston)

For many years Cicero's voice was silent. In the civil war he sided with Pompey and when after the defeat at Pharsalia in 48 B.C. he returned to Italy he wandered sadly from one of his country villas to another writing great works of philosophy and unphilosophical letters to his friends. Caesar was at some pains to conciliate him and once or twice Cicero came out of his retreat to pronounce before the all-powerful dictator a plea for the restoration of some opponent. There is skill in these speeches, but their fulsome flattery of the tyrant makes them sad reading to those who have known the outspoken Cicero of old days. But the murder of the tyrant on the Ides of March 44 B. C. loosed Cicero's tongue once more. There was a chance of restoring the old constitution, if only the new tyrant, Mark Antony, could be overthrown. Cicero threw all his weight into this task, and pronounced the great series of Philippic Orations, so called from their likeness to the speeches in which the Athenian orator Demosthenes attacked Philip of Macedon (see Pageant of Greece, p. 362). Our last quotation, the peroration of the second of these speeches, will show that all the old fire had returned.

REMEMBER therefore, Marcus Antonius, that great day on which you declared the dictatorship abolished; call up before your eyes the joy of the Senate and the people of Rome; contrast it with this present trafficking on the part of yourself and your friends: and then you will understand what a gulf there is fixed between gain and glory. But no doubt, as some men are prevented by a diseased or torpid condition of the sense of taste from enjoying their food, so the profligate, the miser, and the violent criminal have no relish for true glory. Yet if glory cannot attract you to right courses, has fear no power to deter you from the foulest deeds? You do not fear the courts of law. If you rely on your innocence, I commend you; if you rely on violence, do you not understand what a man who does not fear the law for such reasons as yours must necessarily apprehend? But if you are not afraid of brave men and eminent citizens because your person is secured against them by armed men, your own followers, believe me, will not much longer bear with you. And what sort of existence is it for a man to fear his own friends day and night? Yet you cannot pretend that they are bound to you by greater obligations than those by which your master held certain of those who slew him, or that you are in any respect to be compared with him. He had genius, method, a retentive memory, a taste for literature, a character painstaking thoughtful, and energetic. His campaigns though disastrous to the constitution were still imposing. For many years he had set his mind on regal power, and after great toil and great perils he had accomplished his design. By public shows and buildings, by bounties and banquets, he had conciliated the ignorant masses, he had firmly secured his adherents by substantial rewards and his opponents by a pretence of clemency. In a word he had at last brought a community of free men partly terrorized and partly acquiescent to tolerate a slavery grown familiar. I can class you with him in your appetite for despotic power, but in no other respect are you in any way worthy to be compared. Still out of all the evils of which he left the brand upon our unhappy country this much good has come, that the Roman people has learnt at last how much to trust this man or that on whom to rely, of whom to beware. Have you not reflected on this? do you not comprehend that one lesson is enough to teach brave men how essentially noble, how deserving of gratitude, how sure of renown, is the act of tyrannicide? Or do you think that when men did not endure him, they will endure you? In the near future, believe me there will be competition for this task, and the moment to strike, if it taries will be anticipated. Consider, I pray you, your country at last, consider your ancestors and not your associates. Treat me as you will but be reconciled to your country. However you will take your own course. I will state my position for myself. I defended my country when I was a young man. I will not desert her in my old age. I despised Catiline's sword, I shall not quail before yours. Nay I would willingly bare my breast to them if the freedom of this State could be guaranteed at once at the price of my life that the anguish of the Roman people might at least effect the deliverance of which it has been so long in travail. Yes if nearly twenty years ago in this very temple I said that one who had lived to be Consul could not complain of an early death how much more truly shall I not now say the same of one who is old? To me indeed my lord's death is now actually desirable, since I have discharged all the tasks that have been imposed upon me and all that I have undertaken. I have but two desires now, the one, that when I die I may leave the Roman people still in the enjoyment of freedom—no greater boon than this can be granted me by heaven; the other, that every man may fare well or ill, as his conduct towards his country deserves.

(Phil. ii. 45, 115, tr. Blakiston.)

But this brave and whole-hearted opposition to Antony sealed Cicero's doom, and when in 43 B. C. Antony, Octavius, and Lepidus were appointed as a special commission to govern Rome one of their first acts was to order the execution of Cicero, and he met his fate like a man.

With Cicero Roman oratory reached its climax, and it also perished. Under the Empire circumstances did not favour great speaking. The debates in the servile Senate were for the most part formal, and the transference of the law-courts from the open air of the Forum to small indoor courts tended to check the flow of eloquence, even as it suppressed irrelevance. In his Dialogue on Famous Orators (c. A. D. 74) Tacitus laments the decay of the Republican eloquence, and the only speech of Imperial times which has come down to us is a Panegyric on the emperor Trajan pronounced by the younger Pliny in A. D. 100, a work as frigid in style as it is degraded in its sentiments. Yet more perhaps than Greek, Roman oratory has been the model for the great speakers of the modern world, and the English orators of the eighteenth century owed to it both their general conception of eloquence and the technique of their style. It would not be untrue to say that more than any single writer of antiquity Cicero has left his mark on the literature of the world.

PHILOSOPHY

PHILOSOPHY was not a natural growth at Rome—indeed, it was regarded by the average Roman with definite mistrust, and we hear that philosophers were banished from the city in 161 B. C. and again as late as the reign of Domitian. The Roman essentially a man of action engaged in the practical business of war or politics, was not given to pausing on his way to reflect deeply on the nature of the world or the ultimate meaning of human life. If he asked questions at all they were as to practical matters of conduct, but even then he was not inclined to debate, but loved to formulate his conclusions in pithy proverbial sayings which he could keep by him as maxims to be acted upon. Among the few fragments of early Roman literature which have been preserved we find such aphorisms attributed to Appius Claudius the Censor (312 B. C.) or to a mysterious personage known as Marcus the Seer. 'Every man must forge his own fortune', 'When you see a friend forget your woes—Be the last to speak, the first to hold your tongue' are typical examples. Similar maxims were embodied with great frequency in Roman drama, in tragedy and comedy alike, and many of them have remained as household words in modern life. 'The quarrels of lovers are the renewal of love', 'Tis sweet to receive praise from a man who is praised himself', 'I am a human being—I count nothing human alien to me'. In the later days of the Republic they seem to have been regarded as the special prerogative of the mime and an anthology was made of the apophthegms of Publilius Syrus,¹ a mime-writer contemporary with Cicero—they are of no great merit either in style or content and one or two may here be taken to represent the rest. 'Expect from others what you do to them', 'The wise is master of his lusts—the fool their slave', 'Oblivion is the remedy for wrongs', 'To make a friend blush is to lose a friend'. Such sayings show a certain interest in ethical matters—more often perhaps in character for its own sake—and some shrewdness of insight, but they do not imply the kind of thought which gives birth to a national philosophy. Nor indeed was there ever such at Rome, but Greek learning when it came, brought philosophy in its train, and the result was a considerable influence on the thought, if not on the writings, of the educated classes. We can almost date its beginning in the year 155 B.C. when there arrived at Rome an embassy from Athens consisting of the heads of three of the great philosophical schools, the Stoic, the Peripatetic (based on the teaching of Aristotle), and the Academic (based on the teaching of Plato). Their coming was strongly opposed by the elder Cato, but in the next generation the younger Scipio and his friends, who made a cult of all things Greek, included philosophy among their interests and had as their teacher the Stoic Panaetius: in their circle Cicero loves to place the scene of his philosophic dialogues.

¹ See p. 169

It was about this time that the old Roman religion, which had largely degenerated into formalism, had begun to lose its hold, and while in the popular mind its place was taken by the more exciting forms of worship which reached Rome from the East, the more educated took refuge in Greek philosophy. Yet the direction of their interest is characteristic. Abstract speculation on the ultimate constitution of the universe or on the processes and modes of human thought or the means by which knowledge is attained had little attraction for the Roman: moral philosophy, which might supply a guide and a standard for life, was his primary interest, or else that borderland between philosophy and religion where speculation might supply the place of belief, or an accepted theory of the relation of God to man might satisfy his naturally religious conscience when the old faith had broken down. And so we find that it was to the more practical creeds of Stoicism and Epicureanism, both of which gave prominence to an ethical theory consonant in practice with the Roman moral ideal, that men turned in preference to the more speculative and less concrete systems of Plato and Aristotle. And in the end it was Stoicism which prevailed, largely because it left room for a refined and philosophical religion. It is clear too that philosophical and religious ideas were much influenced by the mystic tendencies of Pythagoreanism, which looked to a future existence of the soul separated from the body and had been introduced to Rome by Cicero's friend and teacher Posidonius.

There are among extant Latin writers only two whose writings on philosophy are worth consideration, Cicero and Seneca, and of these Seneca is so discursive and unmethodical that he can do little more than reflect the prevalent attitude of his age. MARCUS TULLIUS CICERO (whom we have already met as orator, p. 444, and letter-writer, p. 320) was indefatigable: he had studied philosophy in his youth as part of his preparation for oratory kept up the practice of philosophical thought and discussion during the active years of his political life and turned again to philosophic writing in his later years when the Caesarian domination left him little part to play in politics. In these years he doubtless intended in his writings to cover the whole field of philosophical speculation but it is clear that certain sides of it made a far stronger appeal to him than others. He was not an original thinker and there is not much in his works beyond the exposition which can be said to be his own. His method was usually to imagine a discussion taking place sometimes among the members of the Scipionic circle sometimes between himself and his contemporaries in which the views of the various schools are put forward and criticized by opponents often without any definite conclusion being reached. His own position in so far as he had one might be described as that of an 'Academic Eclectic' that is to say that while he followed in general the tradition of the Platonic school he was not averse to looking for help to the other sects as well and in particular in his later works tended to approximate more and more to the views of the Stoics especially on the moral and religious side. We will take examples as far as possible from works on different parts of philosophy which will illustrate both his versatility and his manner. It will be seen at once that with him philosophy was the orator's relaxation for his dialogues far from being written in the easy flowing half poetic style of Plato are in effect pure rhetoric. The parties to the discussion make speeches in which they employ all the oratorical artifices or else cross-examine one another as if they were counsel for the prosecution or defence.

We may take first his works on political philosophy as being the most naturally akin to the interests of his own life. He followed the lead of Plato in writing two treatises one On Laws and the other On the State (De Republica) of which the latter was the more important and in some ways the most original of his philosophic works since his theory is coloured not merely by the teaching of the Platonic school but also by his own political experience. He believes the ideal constitution to be a combination of the elements of monarchy aristocracy and democracy such as existed in Rome in the second century B.C. a period to which in his political speeches as well he constantly turns back. As a typical passage may be quoted one in which—following Plato closely and arguing more from the experience of Athens than from that of Rome—he explains how democratic licence may result from the overthrow of tyranny.

WHEN I shall have explained my opinion respecting the form of government which I prefer, I shall be able to speak to you more accurately respecting the revolutions of States, though I think there is little danger of them in the mixed form of government which I recommend. With respect, however, to absolute monarchy, it presents an inherent and invincible tendency to revolution. No sooner does a king begin to be unjust, than this entire form of government is demolished, for the best absolute monarchy is close to tyranny, which is the worst of all governments. If this State falls into the hands of the nobles, it becomes an aristocracy, or the second of the three kinds of constitutions I have described. This consists of a council of the chief fathers consulting for the public benefit. Or, if the people have expelled or demolished a tyrant, it may establish a democracy, or government of its wisest and ablest members, and sometimes flourish in its enterprises, and endeavour to defend the policy it has constituted. But if ever the people should raise its forces against a just king, and rob him of his throne, or, as hath frequently happened, should taste the blood of its legitimate nobles, and subject the whole commonwealth to its own licence, you can imagine no flood or conflagration so terrible, or any whose violence is harder to appease than this unbridled insolence of the populace.

Then we see realized that which Plato so vividly describes, if I could but express it in our language. It is by no means easy to do it justice in translation : however I will try.

‘When (says Plato) the insatiate jaws of the populace are fired with the thirst of liberalism, and, urged on by evil ministers, they drain the cup, not of tempered liberty, but unmitigated licence ; then their magistrates and chiefs, if they are not quite subservient and remiss, and do not largely promote the popular licentiousness, are pursued, incriminated, accused, and cried down under the title of despots and tyrants.’ I dare say you recollect the passage.

Laelius —Yes it is very familiar to me

Scipio —Plato thus proceeds 'Then those who feel in duty bound to obey the chiefs of the State are persecuted by the insensate populace who call them voluntary slaves. But those in the magistracies who flatter the popular equality, and the demagogues who plead the levelling system and endeavour to abolish all distinctions between nobles and commoners these they stun with acclamations and overwhelm with honours. It inevitably happens in a commonwealth thus revolutionized that liberalism superabounds in all directions due authority is found wanting even in private families and misrule seems to extend even to the animals that witness it. Then the father fears the son, and the son neglects the father. All modesty is banished they become far too liberal for that. No difference is made between the citizen and the alien the master dreads and cajoles his scholars, and they despise their masters. The conceited striplings assume the gravity of sages and sages must stoop to the follies of children, lest they should be hated and oppressed. The very slaves hold themselves as high as their lords, wives boast the same rights as their husbands, dogs horses, and asses are emancipated in this outrageous excess of freedom and run about so violently that they frighten the passengers from the road. At length this infinite licentiousness produces such a morbid self sufficiency such fastidious and effeminate sentiments get possession of the people that when they observe even the slightest exertion of magisterial authority they grow angry and seditious and thus the laws are necessarily infringed because there is no ruler that dares to execute them

(De Republica I cc. 43 44 tr F Barham)

In two of his books Cicero made a gallant attempt to get away from the normal Roman interest in morals and religion and to introduce into a Latin setting some of the more ultimate questions which were dear to the Greek thinkers. The Timaeus is a discussion of the origin of the world from a metaphysical point of view, and the Academics an inquiry into the base assumptions escape us in a piece of music do the ears of those catch who are practised in that study? Such men tell us at the first note of the flute-player that it is the Antiope or the Andromachia though we have not even a glimmering of the fact. It is not at all needful to talk of the senses of taste and smell which show power of comprehension to a certain extent though the power is defective. What of touch and of that touch too which philosophers call the inner touch either of pleasure or of pain? It is in this alone that the Cyrenaics believe the criterion of truth to reside because truth is matter of feeling—well can any one say that there is no difference between a man who feels pain and one who is in a state of pleasure? Or rather would not any one likely to pronounce such an opinion be most unquestionably mad? But then, whatever be the character of those perceptions which we say are made by the senses, such nature have the inferences from them which are not said to be directly perceived by the senses, but only in a certain degree by the senses. statements like these, for example 'that object is white this sweet, that melodious this fragrant, this rough.' We now hold these judgments as 'apprehended' by the mind not merely by the senses. Next in order come these statements 'that object is a horse, that a dog.' Next follow the remaining links in the chain of judgments which bind up with the others some of higher importance, those for example which embrace what we may call a fully completed perception of their subject matter 'if an object is a man it is a creature subject to death, endowed with reason. This is the class of judgments whereby conceptions of things are impressed upon our minds and without these no one can either comprehend or inquire or debate.

(Academica Priora II c 7, tr J S Reid)

In the sphere of moral philosophy we have three main works by Cicero the five books On the End (or Aim) of human action (De finibus bonorum et malorum) a discussion rather on the lines of the Academics of the ethical theories of the various schools, the three books on Duties (De officiis), which deal with the application of moral theories in practice; and the five books of Discussions at Tusculum, which treat of detached questions such as the fear of death and the endurance of pain. To these must be added the two short and delightful works On Friendship and On Old Age, which are too well known to be quoted here and should be read in full in one of their many English translations. We may take as typical of Cicero's writing on such ethical subjects a passage from the first-named work, where Cicero represents himself as arguing against the Epicurean Torquatus in refutation of the theory that pleasure is the end of life: pleasure, he says in effect, is the aim of the beasts, and man is made for something higher.

THEREFORE we are bound, Torquatus, to find some other Chief Good for man. Let us leave pleasure to the lower animals, to whose evidence on this question of the Chief Good your school is fond of appealing. But what if even animals are prompted by their several natures to do many actions conclusively proving that they have some other End in view than pleasure? Some of them show kindness even at the cost of trouble, as for instance in giving birth to and rearing their offspring; some delight in running and roaming about; others are gregarious, and create something resembling a social polity; in a certain class of birds we see some traces of affection for human beings, recognition, recollection; and in many we even notice regret for a lost friend. If animals therefore possess some semblance of the human virtues unconnected with pleasure, are men themselves to display no virtue except as a means to pleasure? And shall we say that man, who so far surpasses all other living creatures, has been gifted by nature with no exceptional endowment?

As a matter of fact, if pleasure be all in all, the lower animals are far and away superior to ourselves. The Earth herself without labour of theirs lavishes on them food from her stores in great variety and abundance; whereas we with the most laborious efforts can scarcely if at all supply our needs. Yet I cannot think that the Chief Good can possibly be the same for a brute beast and for a man. What is the use of all our vast machinery of culture, of the great company of liberal studies, of the goodly fellowship of the virtues, if all these things are sought after solely for the sake of pleasure? Suppose when Xerxes led forth his huge fleets and armies of horse and foot, bridged the Hellespont, cut through Athos, marched over sea and sailed over land—suppose on his reaching Greece with his great armada some one asked him the reason for all this enormous apparatus of warfare, and he were to reply that he had wanted to procure some honey from Hymettus¹ surely he would be thought to have had no adequate motive for so vast an undertaking. So with our Wise Man, equipped and adorned with all the noblest accomplishments and virtues, not like Xerxes traversing the seas on foot and the mountains on shipboard, but mentally embracing sky and earth and sea in their entirety—to say that this man's aim is pleasure is to say that all his high endeavour is for the sake of a little honey.

No Torquatus believe me, we are born for loftier and more splendid purposes. Nor is this evidenced by the mental faculties alone, including as they do a memory for countless facts, in your case indeed a memory of unlimited range, a power of forecasting the future little short of divination, the sense of modesty to curb the appetites, love of justice, the faithful guardian of human society, contempt of pain and death, remaining firm and steadfast when toil is to be endured and danger undergone.

(De finibus bonorum et malorum, II. cc. 33. 34
tr. H. Rackham)

Possibly the group of dialogues most characteristic alike of Cicero himself of his age, and of the Roman attitude to philosophy is that which contains what we might call the three 'theological' works On the nature of the gods, On divination, and On fate. In the first of which there are three books, Cicero discusses in his methodical way the various theological views of the great philosophical schools. In the second he deals in a rather sceptical spirit with the possibility of foretelling the future by means of omens and auguries while in the short dialogue On fate he once again discusses various views which have been held on the question of what we might now call 'determinism' as against 'chance'. Here we will take a striking passage from the first work, in which Cicero ridicules the idea that a god must have a human form and be a person 'of like passions with ourselves':

AS for your own utterances, they are absolute fictions, scarcely worthy to be discussed by old women over their evening work, for you do not realise how much you would have to become liable for if you obtained our consent to an identity of form between men and the gods. All the ways of attending to and managing the body will have to be observed in the same way by God as by man,—walking, running, reclining, stooping, sitting, holding, and lastly, also, the faculty of speech and discourse. I need not discuss your division of the gods into male and female, for you see what follows from that. For my own part I cannot sufficiently wonder how it was that your founder came to entertain such ideas. But your constant cry is that the blessedness and immortality of God must be retained. Well, what prevents his being blessed, if he were something else than a biped? Or why is not this quality, whether we are to call it beatitas or beatitudo—both of them, it is true, harsh-sounding terms, but it is for us to make words smooth by using them—why is it not, under whatever name, attributable to the sun above, or to this world of ours, or to some ever-enduring intelligence that is without form and bodily parts? All that you say is, 'I have never seen a sun or world that was blessed.' Well, have you ever seen a world besides this one? You will say no. Why did you venture to say, then, not that there were some hundreds of thousands, but a countless number of worlds? 'Reason taught me.' And will not reason, considering that what is being sought is a nature of supreme excellence, which is at the same time blessed and eternal, for only a nature with those attributes is divine, teach you that, just as we are surpassed by such a nature in immortality, so we are surpassed in excellence of mind, and, as in excellence of mind, so also in excellence of body? Why, then, seeing that we are inferior in other respects, are we equal in the matter of form? It was the virtue of man rather than his figure that came nearest to a likeness to God.

(De Natura Deorum, I. cc. 34, 35, tr. F. Brooks.)

We may conclude with a quotation from Scipio's Dream, which was intended to form the end of the work On the State and is one of the places in which the influence of Pythagoreanism on Cicero's thought is most obvious. In this passage, which deals with the immortality of the heroic soul, is summed up much of the truer feeling of the Republican Roman on death and on the truly Roman life, of which the highest motive should be an exalted patriotism

WHEN he ceased to speak, I said, 'Oh Africanus, if indeed the door of heaven is open to those who have deserved well of their country, whatever progress I may have made since my childhood in following yours and my father's steps, I will from henceforth strive to follow them more closely

'Follow them, then (said he), and consider your body only, not yourself, as mortal. For it is not your outward form which constitutes your being but your mind, not that substance which is palpable to the senses, but your spiritual nature. Know, then, that you are a god—for a god it must be that vivifies, and gives sensation, memory, and foresight to the body to which it is attached, and which it governs and regulates, as the Supreme Ruler does the world which is subject to him. As that Eternal Being moves whatever is mortal in this world so the immortal mind of man moves the frail body with which it is connected; for what always moves must be eternal, but what derives its motion from a power which is foreign to itself, when that motion ceases, must itself lose its animation

'That alone then which moves itself, can never cease to be moved, because it can never desert itself. It must be the source and origin of motion in all the rest. There can be nothing prior to this origin, for all things must originate from it—itself cannot derive its existence from any other source, for if it did, it would no longer be primary. And if it had no beginning it can have no end for a beginning that is put an end to will neither be renewed by any other cause, nor will it produce any thing else of itself. All things, therefore, must originate from one source

Thus it follows, that motion must have its source in what is moved by itself, and which can neither have a beginning nor an end. Otherwise all the heavens and all nature must perish ; for it is impossible that they can of themselves acquire any power of producing motion in themselves.

'As, therefore, it is plain that what is moved by itself must be eternal, who will deny that this is the general condition of minds ? For, as every thing is inanimate which is moved by an impulse exterior to itself, so what is animated is moved by an interior impulse of its own ; for this is the peculiar nature and power of mind. And if that alone has the power of self-motion it can neither have had a beginning, nor can it have an end.

'Do you, therefore, exercise this mind of yours in the best pursuits, which consist in promoting the good of your country. Such employments will speed the flight of your mind to this its proper abode ; and its flight will be still more rapid if it will look abroad and disengage itself from its bodily dwelling, in the contemplation of things which are external to itself.

'This it should do to the utmost of its power. For the minds of those who have given themselves up to the pleasures of the body, paying as it were a servile obedience to their lustful impulses, have violated the laws of God and man ; and therefore, when they are separated from their bodies, flutter continually round the earth on which they lived, and are not allowed to return to this celestial region till they have been purified by the revolution of many ages.'

Thus saying he vanished, and I awoke from my dream.

(Somnium Scipionis, cc. 8, 9, tr. F. Barham.)

Of LUCIUS ANNAEUS SENECA mention has already been made in the sections on Drama (p. 185), on Letter-writing (p. 336), and on Satire (p. 299). As a philosopher he was primarily a Stoic and was deeply imbued not so much with the intellectual system of the Stoics as with their ideal of character. His interest was almost entirely in the moral side of their philosophy, but he was groping through it to religion, and had so real a sense of the relation of God to man that he has sometimes been spoken of as the nearest of all pagans to Christianity But his Stoicism was liberal in its acceptance and he was ready to seek light and to quote apophorisms from any philosophic writer, whatever his creed He wrote philosophical dialogues—amiable amateur discussions on points of morals with no very close reasoning, but exhibiting a sound common-sense outlook on life and some real insight into the essentials of conduct We may quote first from the dialogue On the Happy Life, which was addressed to his brother Gallio, the Roman official before whom St Paul was brought at Corinth The passage shows rather closer argument than usual and is a good exposition of the main Stoic position in morals 'virtue' must be the moral ideal and can have no truck with 'pleasure', the moral ideal of the Epicureans

BUT what,' asks our adversary, 'is there to hinder virtue and pleasure being combined together, and a highest good being thus formed, so that honour and pleasure may be the same thing? Because nothing except what is honourable can form a part of honour, and the highest good would lose its purity if it were to see within itself anything unlike its own better part Even the joy which arises from virtue, although it be a good thing, yet is not a part of absolute good, any more than cheerfulness or peace of mind, which are indeed good things, but which merely follow the highest good, and do not contribute to its perfection, although they are generated by the noblest causes Whoever on the other hand forms an alliance, and that, too a one-sided one between virtue and pleasure, clogs whatever strength the one may possess by the weakness of the other, and sends liberty under the yoke for liberty can only remain unconquered as long as she knows nothing more valuable than herself for he begins to need the help of Fortune, which is the most utter slavery his life becomes anxious, full of suspicion, timorous, fearful of accidents, waiting in agony for critical moments of time You do not afford virtue a solid immoveable base if you bid it stand on what is unsteady and what can be so unsteady as dependence on mere chance, and the vicissitudes of the body and of those things which act on the body? How can such a man obey God and receive everything which comes to pass in a cheerful spirit, never complaining of fate, and putting a good construction upon everything that befalls him, if he be agitated by the petty pin-pricks of pleasures and pains? A man cannot be a good protector of his country, a good avenger of her wrongs, or a good defender of his friends, if he be inclined to pleasures. Let the highest good, then, rise to that height from whence no force can dislodge it, whither neither pain can ascend, nor hope, nor fear, nor anything else that can impair the authority of the 'highest good'. Thither virtue alone can make her way: by her aid that hill must be climbed: she will bravely stand her ground and endure whatever may befall her not only resignedly, but even willingly: she will know that all hard times come in obedience to natural laws, and like a good soldier she will bear wounds, count scars, and when transfixed and dying will yet adore the general for whom she falls: she will bear in mind the old maxim 'Follow God'. On the other hand, he who grumbles and complains and bemoans himself is nevertheless forcibly obliged to obey orders, and is dragged away, however much against his will, to carry them out: yet what madness is it to be dragged rather than to follow? as great, by Hercules, as it is folly and ignorance of one's true position to grieve because one has not got something or because something has caused us rough treatment, or to be surprised or indignant at those ills which befall good men as well as bad ones, I mean diseases, deaths, illnesses, and the other cross accidents of human life. Let us bear with magnanimity whatever the system of the universe makes it needful for us to bear: we are all bound by this oath: 'To bear the ills of mortal life, and to submit with a good grace to what we cannot avoid.' We have been born into a monarchy: our liberty is to obey God. (De beata vita, c. xv, tr. A. Stewart.)

A second passage may be taken from the dialogue On Mercy. It is less of a sermon than the first quotation, and represents Stoicism in a severer mood: the wise man may show mercy, which is prompted by reason, but he must not feel pity, which is a mere weakness.

JUST as the gods are worshipped by religion, but are dishonoured by superstition, so all good men will show mercy and mildness, but will avoid pity, which is a vice incident to weak minds which cannot endure the sight of another's sufferings. It is, therefore, most commonly found in the worst people; there are old women and girls who are affected by the tears of the greatest criminals, and who if they could, would let them out of prison. Pity considers a man's misfortunes and does not consider to what they are due. mercy is combined with reason. I know that the doctrine of the Stoics is unpopular among the ignorant as being excessively severe and not at all likely to give kings and princes good advice, it is blamed because it declares that the wise man knows not how to feel pity or to grant pardon. These doctrines, if taken separately, are indeed odious, for they appear to give men no hope of repairing their mistakes, but exact a penalty for every slip. If this were true how can it be true wisdom to bid us put off human feeling and to exclude us from mutual help, that surest haven of refuge against the attacks of Fortune? But no school of philosophy is more gentle and benignant, none is more full of love towards man or more anxious to promote the happiness of all, seeing that its maxims are to be of service and assistance to others, and to consult the interests of each and all, not of itself alone. Pity is a disorder of the mind caused by the sight of other men's miseries, or it is a sadness caused by the evils with which it believes others to be undeservedly afflicted. but the wise man cannot be affected by any disorder. his mind is calm, and nothing can possibly happen to ruffle it. Moreover, nothing becomes a man more than magnanimity. but magnanimity cannot coexist with sorrow. Sorrow overwhelms men's minds, casts them down, contracts them. now this cannot happen to the wise man even in his greatest misfortunes. but he will beat back the rage of Fortune and triumph over it. he will always retain the same calm, undisturbed expression of countenance, which he never could do were he accessible to sorrow.

It has been seen already (p. 336) how through the long series of letters to Lucilius there runs a strain of philosophy. Sometimes it seems to come more clearly to the surface, but it is always of a garrulous, easy-going type and puts no strain on Lucilius's comprehension. A fair specimen may be taken from a letter on old age: it ought probably to be described as moralizing rather than philosophy, and perhaps that might really be said with justice of Seneca's work as a whole.

I OWE it to my country-place that my old age became apparent whithersoever I turned. Let us cherish and love old age; for it is full of pleasure if one knows how to use it. Fruits are most welcome when almost over; youth is most charming at its close; the last drink delights the toper,—the glass which souses him and puts the finishing touch on his drunkenness. Each pleasure reserves to the end the greatest delights which it contains. Life is most delightful when it is on the downward slope, but has not yet reached the abrupt decline. And I myself believe that the period which stands, so to speak, on the edge of the roof, possesses pleasures of its own. Or else the very fact of our not wanting pleasures has taken the place of the pleasures themselves. How comforting it is to have tired out one's appetites, and to have done with them! 'But,' you say, 'it is a nuisance to be looking death in the face!' Death, however, should be looked in the face by young and old alike. We are not summoned according to our rating on the censor's list. Moreover, no one is so old that it would be improper for him to hope for another day of existence. And one day, mind you, is a stage on life's journey.

Our span of life is divided into parts; it consists of large circles enclosing smaller. One circle embraces and bounds the rest; it reaches from birth to the last day of existence. The next circle limits the period of our young manhood. The third confines all of childhood in its circumference. Again, there is, in a class by itself, the year; it contains within itself all the divisions of time by the multiplication of which we get the total of life. The month is bounded by a narrower ring. The smallest circle of all is the day but even a day has its beginning and its ending its sunrise and its sunset Hence Heraclitus whose obscure style gave him his surname¹ remarked One day is equal to every day Different persons have interpreted the saying in different ways Some hold that days are equal in number of hours and this is true for if by day we mean twenty four hours time all days must be equal inasmuch as the night acquires what the day loses But others maintain that one day is equal to all days through resemblance because the very longest space of time possesses no element which cannot be found in a single day—namely light and darkness—and even to eternity day makes these alternations more numerous not different when it is shorter and different again when it is longer Hence every day ought to be regulated as if it closed the series as if it rounded out and completed our existence

Pacuvius who by long occupancy made Syria his own used to hold a regular burial sacrifice in his own honour with wine and the usual funeral feasting and then would have himself carried from the dining room to his chamber while eunuchs applauded and sang in Greek to a musical accompaniment He has lived his life he has lived his life! Thus Pacuvius had himself carried out to burial every day Let us however do from a good motive what he used to do from a debased motive let us go to our sleep with joy and gladness let us say

I have lived the course which Fortune set for me
Is finished

And if God is pleased to add another day we should welcome it with glad hearts That man is happiest and is secure in his own possession of himself who can await the morrow without apprehension When a man has said I have lived! every morning he arises he receives a bonus

(Ep Mor vii 4-9 tr R M Gummere)

He was known n antiqu ty as The dark one (δ σκοτεινός)

It has been seen already (p. 336) how through the long series of letters to Lucilius there runs a strain of philosophy. Sometimes it seems to come more clearly to the surface, but it is always of a garrulous, easy-going type and puts no strain on Lucilius's comprehension. A fair specimen may be taken from a letter on old age: it ought probably to be described as moralizing rather than philosophy, and perhaps that might really be said with justice of Seneca's work as a whole.

I OWE it to my country-place that my old age became apparent whithersoever I turned. Let us cherish and love old age; for it is full of pleasure if one knows how to use it. Fruits are most welcome when almost over; youth is most charming at its close; the last drink delights the toper,—the glass which souses him and puts the finishing touch on his drunkenness. Each pleasure reserves to the end the greatest delights which it contains. Life is most delightful when it is on the downward slope, but has not yet reached the abrupt decline. And I myself believe that the period which stands, so to speak, on the edge of the roof, possesses pleasures of its own. Or else the very fact of our not wanting pleasures has taken the place of the pleasures themselves. How comforting it is to have tired out one's appetites, and to have done with them! 'But,' you say, 'it is a nuisance to be looking death in the face!' Death, however, should be looked in the face by young and old alike. We are not summoned according to our rating on the censor's list. Moreover, no one is so old that it would be improper for him to hope for another day of existence. And one day, mind you, is a stage on life's journey.

Our span of life is divided into parts; it consists of large circles enclosing smaller. One circle embraces and bounds the rest; it reaches from birth to the last day of existence. The next circle limits the period of our young manhood. The third confines all of childhood in its circumference. Again, there is, in a class by itself, the year; it contains within itself all the divisions of time by the multiplication of which we get the total of life. The month is bounded by a narrower ring. The smallest circle of all is the day but even a day has its beginning and its ending its sunrise and its sunset Hence Herachus whose obscure style gave him his surname¹ remarked One day is equal to every day Different persons have interpreted the saying in different ways Some hold that days are equal in number of hours and this is true for if by day we mean twenty four hours time all days must be equal inasmuch as the night acquires what the day loses But others maintain that one day is equal to all days through resemblance because the very longest space of time possesses no element which cannot be found in a single day—namely light and darkness—and even to eternity day makes these alternations more numerous not different when it is shorter and different again when it is longer Hence every day ought to be regulated as if it closed the series as if it rounded out and completed our existence

Pacuvius who by long occupancy made Syria his own used to hold a regular burial sacrifice in his own honour with wine and the usual funeral feasting and then would have himself carried from the dining room to his chamber while eunuchs applauded and sang in Greek to a musical accompaniment He has lived his life he has lived his life! Thus Pacuvius had himself carried out to burial every day Let us however do from a good motive what he used to do from a debased motive let us go to our sleep with joy and gladness let us say

I have lived the course which Fortune set for me
Is finished

And if God is pleased to add another day we should welcome it with glad hearts That man is happiest and is secure in his own possession of himself who can await the morrow without apprehension When a man has said I have lived! every morning he arises he receives a bonus

(Ep Mor xii 4-9 tr R M Gummere)

He was known in antiquity as The dark one (δ σκοτεινός)

Didactic Poetry, pp. 95 ff., and on Science, p. 488) wrote the one complete exposition of a physical philosophy, and his interest in cosmology was carried on with an odd blend of astrology by Manilius (see pp. 126 ff.): the philosophic element again is strong in Virgil and especially in the great description of the fate of the soul in the lower world (see p. 42). Contaminated with rhetoric it shows itself again in the historical epic of Lucan (pp. 55 ff.): in lighter vein it appears in the moralizing of the satirists, and above all of Horace (pp. 288 ff.) who loves to play with philosophical ideas and to make them the groundwork of his banter. But if philosophy is to be defined as serious and consecutive thought on great subjects, then, with the sole exceptions of Lucretius and some parts of Cicero's work, it is wanting in Latin. The Roman was not a philosopher, and for all his interest in morality and religion nothing could make him such.

SCIENCE

THE scientific idea that is the conception that order reigns in Nature and can be traced by human endeavour is essentially a product of the Greek genius. It profoundly influenced Greek modes of thought. Since Greek philosophy was the ancestor of Roman philosophy this idea certainly had its effect on the Roman way of thinking. Nevertheless the clear conception of the pursuit of order in Nature by diligent personal investigation seldom appears in ancient writings in the Latin language.

In Latin literature there is therefore but little to be found of the aspiration for research as we know it to-day and as it was known in Greek antiquity. It is true that among the Latin philosophers especially those of the Stoic and Epicurean schools—e.g. Seneca and Lucretius—we find great emphasis laid on the structure of the Universe and its influence on human fate. But philosophy is not science and in those days as in these the philosopher usually took his science as he found it. He did not investigate Nature for himself. The conception of the Universe limited by the outermost sphere of fixed stars and all within arranged in a simple mathematical order was not of a kind to inspire further curiosity. Moreover the widely held astrological dogma that the body of man and even his destiny was closely linked with the mathematical rule which governed the movements of the heavenly bodies and was indeed a manifestation of that rule turned men's thoughts from considering their own construction. The one thing worth knowing in Nature was the controlling order of the Heavens and that the Roman astrologer knew well.

Thus there is nothing in Latin to compare with the biological works of Aristotle the medical works of the Hippocratic collection the mathematical and physical astronomical and geographical writings of such giants as Aristarchus Archimedes and Eratosthenes or the anatomical and physiological investigations of the brilliant Herophilus and of the industrious and ingenious Galen. The type of labour involved in the preparation of such works made scant appeal to the Roman mind. Yet it is certainly very strange that among an Imperial people naturally interested in the mechanism of government, we find no geographical treatises to compare with the great work of Ptolemy or even the less scientific compilation of Strabo.

In one sense, however, the scarcity of scientific writings in the Latin language is a little deceptive. It must be remembered that even down to late Imperial times every well-educated man wrote and spoke Greek. By a convention of the age, Greek was the language employed for scientific purposes, as French is used now for diplomacy. Strabo, in the first century B. C., was an ardent admirer of Rome and of Roman methods of government. He was constantly in Rome. But his great treatise on geography was written in Greek. Galen, who died in the year A. D. 200, spent all his active life in Rome, and must have habitually used Latin in converse with his patients, among whom was the Emperor Marcus Aurelius himself. Yet his vast works, which provided all anatomical and physical knowledge until the sixteenth century, were composed in Greek, as were the philosophical writings of his royal master. Ptolemy, an older contemporary of Galen who worked in Egypt, then a Roman province, made the final astronomical and geographical synthesis of antiquity. He must have relied on the observations of Roman travellers, soldiers, and officials, yet he, too, employed Greek as his medium. On the other hand, among the few Latin writings to which the name scientific can be applied are some which like that of Celsus are but translations from the Greek. There are others, like that of Pliny the Elder, which lean so heavily on Greek authors that they may be called compilations from the Greek. And lastly, there are a very few works, such as that to which the name of Coelius Aurelianus is attached, in which a writer steeped in Greek, but with an imperfect acquaintance with the Latin tongue, has employed Latin as his medium.

But our estimate of the actual value of Latin scientific literature must not blind us to the role that it has played in history. The heirs of Rome in the West were the Middle Ages. Latin was the sole language of learning throughout that great stretch of time. To understand the Middle Ages we must examine the legacy that passed from the Empire to the barbarian peoples who overran it and gradually absorbed its culture. An important part of that legacy and a part much neglected by historians was Latin science. An examination of it will reveal to us some of the material from which modern thought slowly and painfully evolved during the later Middle Ages. Latin science is medieval science, and it was in a matrix of medieval science that modern science first germinated

It will be convenient to deal with various departments of science separately

§ 1 The Constitution of Matter The Four Elements

In antiquity two views prevailed as to the general nature of matter. One of these views was popularized by Aristotle. According to this theory all matter was made up of four essences, primary substances, principles, or—to give them their technical Latin title—elements. These four were Earth Air Fire and Water. It was held that these formed inimical couples, Fire and Water quenching each other, Earth and Air being of opposing nature.

This theory of elements is partly dealt with by SENECA (3 B.C. A.D. 65¹), a writer of the Stoic school who acted as tutor to Nero. The writings of Seneca were well known to medieval readers, by whom he was often mistaken for a Christian.

WATER, as Thales says, is the most powerful element; he regards it as having been the first to exist and the source of all things. We Stoics hold the same or at any rate a somewhat similar opinion: for we say that it is fire which lays hold upon the universe and turns all things to its own nature. This fire we believe sinks and dies away, so that when fire is extinguished nothing is left in nature save moisture, the hope of the universe that is to be.² Fire therefore is the end and moisture the beginning of the universe. Do you marvel then that rivers can proceed without ceasing from this element which was before all things and from which all are sprung? This moisture in the primal division of things was reduced to a fourth part of the whole and was so placed that it might suffice for the production of rivers, streams and springs. The whole terrestrial globe according to Thales is upborne by water, on which it floats like a boat.

(Quaest. Nat. 1. 13, 14.)

See pp. 181 ff., 199 ff., 336 ff., 476 ff.

² The ancients were naturally familiar with the way in which dry seeds can be made to sprout by being moistened, a process that came to be freely compared to the resurrection of the dead.

from which, more especially in the sea, spring forms innumerable, which, when these seeds are mingled together, are oft-times monstrous in character. Further the evidence of our eyes tells us that in one portion of the skies there is the shape of a wain, in one of a bear, in another a bull, in another a letter, while through the zenith runs the white path of the milky way. . . .

Nor can I find that any doubt that the elements are four in number. The highest is fire, from whence proceed the shining eyes of the multitudinous stars. The next is the spirit, to which the Greeks and ourselves give the same name aer. From this springs life; it penetrates all things and is infused throughout the whole. By its power earth is poised in mid-space together with the fourth element of water. Thus by the mutual embracing of diverse elements all things are united; things light are prevented by things heavy from flying away, while on the other hand that which is weighty is kept from falling by the upward tendency of that which is light. Thus by this straining to move in opposite directions all things are kept in equipoise within the restless whirl of the Universe; and, since this always returns upon itself, the earth holds the central and lowest point, suspended firmly fixed upon the central axis and balancing that whereon it hangs, the one thing without motion in all the rolling Universe, at once bound to every other part and lending them support. Between the earth and heaven, poised in the same element of spirit, hang at fixed intervals the seven stars, known from their continual motion as the planets or wandering stars, though no stars wander less than they. In the midst of them moves the sun, huge in bulk and mighty in its strength, the controller not only of times and climates, but of the heaven and stars as well. (Nat. Hist. ii.)

(b) A more inspiring view than that of Pliny is given by CICERO (106-43 B. C.) in his treatise *De re publica*¹. This is a work of absorbing interest and it is one of the great losses to literature that it survives in only a fragmentary condition. Fortunately, the part with which we are concerned, the Dream of Scipio, is preserved in its entirety. This most remarkable passage recalls the Ission of Er in Plato's Republic (Bk X to end) and Cicero himself tells us that he drew on Plato and Aristotle. Cicero was thus confessedly borrowing from his Greek predecessors. He was composing philosophical works in a language which had not yet been used for the purpose and for a people who had not as yet taken to such studies. The work was moreover written at very great speed and while in a condition of mental anguish. Despite the difficulties of composition the Dream of Scipio is among the gems of Latin thought and expression.

¹ See p. 467

Scipio Africanus the Younger (185-129 B.C.) is here shown the whole Universe in a vision. The heavenly bodies are regarded as the dwelling place of the righteous. The speaker is Scipio's father.

UNLESS that God of whom all that thou beholdest is the temple hath released thee from the prison of the body the way hither is barred to thee. For man is born on this condit on that he should possess that globe which thou seest in the midst of this vast temple even the globe which is called the earth and the soul that is given him is from those everlasting fires which you call planets and stars which englobed and ensphered complete their orbits with marvellous swiftness and are instinct with divine intelligence. Wherefore thou and all good men must keep the soul under the body's ward nor without his bidding that gave it may you depart from mortal life lest you should seem to have abandoned the task assigned by God to man. But do thou Scipio like thy grandsire and like myself that begat thee honour justice and duty duty which great though it be when rendered to parents and kindred is greatest when shown forth in the service of thy country. Live thus and thou shalt find the path to heaven and to the assembly of those who have lived their life and released from the body dwell in this place that thou seest —now the place was a circle of dazzling light shining amid flames which as you have learned from the Greeks is called the Milky Way. And as I gazed therefrom on all around me all things else that I saw seemed to me most wondrous and full of glory. Now these stars were such as we have never seen from this earth where we stand and their greatness was such as we have never dreamed of.

and the smallest of them was that which shone with borrowed light, furthest from heaven and nearest to the earth. And the globes of these stars far surpassed the greatness of our world. In truth earth itself seemed so little to my eyes that I deemed this empire of ours, wherewith we but touch a mere point on its whole surface, to be but a sorry thing. Seeing that I fixed my gaze on earth ever more and more, 'How long', said he, 'shall thy spirit be thus bent earthwards? Dost thou not see to what regions of heaven thou art come? Know that all of them are bound together by nine wheels, or rather spheres, of which the outermost is the sphere of heaven which encloses all the remainder, being the very God, the Most High, that encloses and contains the rest. On this heavenly sphere are fixed the eternal courses of the revolving stars. Beneath it are seven spheres that turn with motion counter to that of heaven, whereof one is ruled by that star which on earth is named of Saturn. Next is that light which brings health and blessing to mankind, the star named Jupiter; then comes the red star, earth's bane, that is called of Mars. Next beneath it the Sun holds the region that is nigh the midst, the Sun, leader and prince and governor of the other lights, mind and controller of the Universe, being of such magnitude that it fills and illumines all things with its light. The Sun is followed by the courses of Venus and of Mercury, that are, as it were, his companions, while in the lowest wheel of all spins the Moon, lit with the Sun's beams. Now below the Moon there is naught that is not subject unto death, save only the souls given by the gods to the race of man, whereas above the Moon all things endure to everlasting. For the Earth which comes ninth in the centre of all moves not at all, but is the lowest, and toward it all things that have weight sink of their own downward impulse.'

As I gazed on all these wonders I marvelled, bemused; and when at last I came to my senses, 'What,' I cried, 'what is this sound, so mighty and so sweet, that fills my ears?' 'This', he said, 'is the music which, divided by intervals, unequal but disposed by the eternal reason in due proportion, is made by the speed and motion of these same wheels and, blending high and low, creates diverse smooth flowing harmonies. For such mighty movement cannot hurtle on its way in silence Nature ordains that the innermost should utter forth a deep and the uttermost a shrill tone Wherefore the star bearing course of heaven, that is highest of all and moves most swiftly, sweeps on its way with shrill and vehement sound while the deepest note is given forth by the lunar sphere that is the lowest For the ninth, that is the Earth, remains motionless, clinging everlastingly to one spot in the very heart of the universe Now these eight courses of which two have the same note create seven different sounds parted by intervals the one from the other And this number is, as it were, the knot that binds all things and it was by imitation of these seven intervals with lyre and voice that wise men opened up for themselves a return to this place, even as did those who with surpassing wit ensued after divine studies in this mortal life I filled wholly with this sound the ears of men have grown deaf for you have no diller sense than that of hearing Even so, where the Nile, at those falls which are named the Cataracts, plunges down from exceeding great mountains, the people that dwells in those places has lost the sense of hearing owing to the greatness of the noise Now this sound that is caused by the surpassing speed of the revolution of the universe is so mighty that the ears of man may not take it in, even as you cannot gaze full upon the Sun, but your eyes and senses are vanquished by his beams.' Now though I marvelled at all these things none the less I continued ever and again to turn mine eyes earthwards

Then said he, I perceive that even now thou gazest at the abode of mankind if it seem to thee as small as in truth it is, then fix thine eyes always on these heavenly things, despising those yonder that are of man For what fame on the lips of men or what glory worth the seeking canst thou win? Thou seest that on earth mankind dwells in places of but little room few and far between, and that betwixt even those specks wherein they dwell there lie vast solitudes, and the inhabitants of earth are not only so far sundered that they can have no word, one of the other, but are placed, some at an acute, others at a right angle to yourselves, while yet others are your antipodes, from whom you can assuredly hope for no renown.

'Now thou seest that yonder earth is, as it were, ringed and girt about with certain zones, of which two are as far as may be, one from the other, and at either extremity rest upon the very poles of heaven, both of them congealed with frost, whereas the midmost and greatest zone is scorched with the burning heat of the sun. Two zones there be that are habitable, and of these the southern, whereon men have their feet upturned to yours, concerns not your race at all, while of that which lies beneath the north, your dwelling-place, see how small a part touches your confines. For all the earth which you inhabit is narrowed betwixt north and south, but wider from east to west, being, as it were, a little isle girt about by that sea which you name Atlantic, Great, or Ocean, though thou seest how small it is despite its lofty names. And from these civilized and familiar regions has thy name or that of any man ever had strength to climb over the heights of Caucasus, which thou seest yonder, or to swim the Ganges? Who among the remainder of mankind, dwelling in furthest east or west, shall ever hear of thy name? And if they all are thus sundered from thee, thou seest how narrow is the room in which the glory of man may be spread abroad. And as for those very men that do speak of you, how long shall they continue so to speak?'

(Somn. Scip., 15-20.)

§ 4. Astronomy.

In addition to such conceptions of the Universe as that set forth by Cicero and Pliny, the Latins were acquainted to some extent with observational astronomy. Elementary astronomical knowledge was of great antiquity among them. Such knowledge is indeed necessary for an agricultural people unprovided with a reliable calendar, with which the Romans were not equipped until the end of the pre-Christian period. In the Alexandrian school in Egypt, however, astronomy had been for centuries a favourite subject of study. Egypt was absorbed into the Empire in the year 30 B. C. Long before then as Pliny tells us some of the results of Greek astronomical science had become known to the Romans. With the inclusion of Alexandria in the Empire, however, such material became even more accessible. The greatest of the astronomers of the Empire, Ptolemy, worked at Alexandria.

Astronomical knowledge as sketched by PLINY, gives an idea of what might be expected of an educated but not technically instructed Roman of his time.

IT is obvious that the sun is eclipsed by the intervention of the moon and the moon by the opposition of the earth and also that these effects are reciprocal the moon robbing the earth and the earth robbing the moon of the sunlight. As the moon creeps on, a veil of sudden darkness is drawn across the earth while the sun is dimmed by her shadow and night is nothing save the shadow of the earth. Now this shadow is in shape like a cone or inverted top since it strikes the moon only with its point and does not exceed her altitude. For no other heavenly body is obscured in like manner and a figure of this kind always terminates in a point. The fact that shadows are annihilated by distance is proved by the flight of birds when they soar to a great height. Therefore the limit to which shadows extend is the boundary line between air and ether. Above the moon everything is clear and full of the light of day.

Such reasoning uplifts our mortal minds to heaven and as we look down therefrom reveals to us the size of the three greatest constituent parts of Nature. For the sun could not be completely hidden from earth by the intervention of the moon if the earth were greater than the moon. And the vastness of the third constituent namely the sun is made manifest by consideration of the other two so that it is not necessary to judge its magnitude by the evidence of the eyes or by abstract speculation. For the immensity of its bulk is obvious from the following facts. The shadows of trees planted in rows of unlimited length fall at equal intervals as though the sun were in the middle of space. Again at the equinox it is immediately over the heads of all who dwell in southern lands while the shadows of those who inhabit the regions of the tropics fall to the north at noon and to the west at sunrise. Now this would be impossible if the sun were not far greater than the earth ; a fact which is further shown by the circumstance that at sunrise it far exceeds Mount Ida in breadth, overlapping it widely on either side, despite its remoteness. The eclipse of the moon also gives clear proof of the sun's magnitude, just as the sun's eclipse demonstrates the smallness of the earth. For shadows assume one of three figures : it is known that if the body casting the shadow be equal to the source of light the shadow will be shaped like a pillar and have no termination ; on the other hand, if the body be greater than the source of light, its shadow will be in the shape of an inverted cone, whose apex will point downwards and whose length will be infinite ; whereas, if the body be less than the source of light, the shape of the shadow will be that of a cone standing on its base, point uppermost. Now, since the shadow seen at eclipses of the moon is of the last of these three types, obviously there can be no further doubt that the sun is larger than the earth.

(Nat. Hist., ii, §§ 47 ff.)

§ 5. Geography.

The most disappointing department in the whole range of Roman science is Geography. The only classical work devoted to the subject is that of Pomponius Mela (about A. D. 43). It is a very inadequate account, obviously by a man of no great scientific attainments. Some geographical material may be gleaned from historical writers such as Tacitus and Livy or from philosophical authors such as Cicero and Seneca, or from works on general science such as those of Lucretius and Pliny. The real representatives of geography under the Empire are, however, works in Greek such as the scientific treatises of Eratosthenes (fragments only), Strabo, and Ptolemy.

The Earth, as described by the geographers of the Empire, was a sphere.¹ The surface of the Earth was divided, according to Roman reckoning, into a series of climates or spaces between parallels of latitude. Twenty-four such climates intervene between the equator and the pole each corresponding to an increase of half an hour in the length of the longest day. More familiarly, it was divided into a series of zones—a torrid zone impassable by reason of heat round the equator, two temperate zones in the northern of which we dwell, and a frigid zone around each of the two poles. The southern hemisphere was of academic interest only, for it was believed to be inaccessible. Yet, in the Antipodes, it was somehow felt that there dwelt the Antichthones with their feet pointing to ours.

¹ Tacitus alone among educated Romans, as far as we know, clung to the opinion that the Earth was flat. In the Middle Ages no scientific writer regarded the world as other than a sphere ; though some cranks and fanatics, without knowledge of Tacitus, held his opinion.

The part of the Earth on which we dwelt was regarded as a great island, which extended in the south but little farther than Meroë, to the north little farther than Britain and Thule to the east no farther than the Ganges, and to the west no farther than Spain. This great island was cut into by four great Gulfs, two from the south—the Persian and Arabian seas, one from the north, the Caspian sea, and a great one from the west the Mediterranean sea. Our Sea as it was familiarly called, of which the Euxine or Black sea was but an offset.

Save for the descriptions of Italy and the countries immediately adjoining thereto, the geographical accounts in Latin are quite surprisingly hazy. This is the more remarkable when we recall the wonderful system of communications of the Empire and the fact that good itineraries giving measured distances between places far apart come down to us. The description of Britain by Pomponius Mela can be read in the companion volume to this work, The Legacy of Rome (p. 308). A more fascinating description is that given by Tacitus in his Agricola.

The shape of Great Britain is compared by Tacitus to a double axe. The natural interpretation of this would be

Tacitus criticizes this view and he seems to imply that the proper comparison is to two triangles in the same rather than in inverted positions thus :

BRTAIN is the largest of all the islands recognized in Roman geography. As to its size and position, it faces Germany on the east, Spain on the west, and on the south is within sight of Gaul. Its northern shores, which have no land opposite, are washed by a vast and open sea. The best historical authorities . . . have compared the shape of the whole island to an oblong dish or a battle-axe. This comparison applies in fact only to Britain, excluding Caledonia. The description of a part has been applied to the whole island. But if you cross the border you find running out from the point where the coasts converge an immense, shapeless tract of country narrowing into a sort of wedge. This was the first occasion on which the Roman fleet coasted round the shores of this distant sea, and established the fact that Britain was an island. On the same voyage they discovered and subdued the islands called the Orkneys, hitherto unknown. They also sighted Thule, but did not land, since they had no orders to proceed farther, and winter was at hand. However, they say that the sea there is sluggish and very heavy to row in, and is never even made rough by winds like other seas. This must be because land and mountains, which cause storms, are rarer there, and the deep mass of unbroken sea is not easily stirred. It is not the business of this work to inquire into the nature of the ocean and its tides, and many have written on the subject. But I may add one point. nowhere is the dominion of the sea more wide—a multitude of currents set in all directions, and the ebb and flow of the tide is not confined to the shore, but the sea works its way far inland and penetrates among highlands and mountains, as though it were in its own domain. The climate is vile, constant rain and clouds. But extreme cold is unknown. The day lasts longer there than it does in our latitude. In the far north of Britain the night is light and short, and only a brief interval divides the end and the beginning of daylight. If clouds do not obscure the sun its rays can be seen by night. It does not set or rise, so they declare, but merely passes across the horizon. The fact is that the land at this extremity of the earth is flat, and casts a low shadow—thus the darkness does not reach very high, and night falls below the level of the sky and stars.

Although the olive and the vine and the other peculiar products of warmer countries do not grow there the soil is fertile and bears crops. They sprout up quickly, but are slow to ripen. The cause is in both cases the same—the abundant moisture of the ground and climate. Britain contains gold and silver and other metals, which reward our conquest. The sea also produces pearls, but they are of a dull leaden hue. Some attribute this to the divers' lack of skill—for in the Red Sea the oysters are torn alive and breathing from the rocks, while in Britain they are gathered as the sea casts them up. Personally I could sooner believe the pearls deficient in quality than mankind in greed.

(Agricola, c. 10, tr. W. H. Fyfe.)

§ 6 Military Engineering

Much might be said of the Latin descriptions of mechanical devices, such as the odometer, the water-clock, and the sundial, or of sanitary engineering, in which some of the greatest constructive achievements of the Romans were carried out. The passages in which these are described have, however, but little literary merit, and are therefore not included in this collection. For descriptions of such works the reader may be referred to nature of the ocean and its tides and many have written on the subject. But I may add one point: nowhere is the dominion of the sea more wide: a multitude of currents set in all directions, and the ebb and flow of the tide is not confined to the shore: but the sea works its way far inland and penetrates among highlands and mountains, as though it were in its own domain. The climate is vile, constant rain and clouds. But extreme cold is unknown. The day lasts longer there than it does in our latitude. In the far north of Britain the night is light and short, and only a brief interval divides the end and the beginning of daylight. If clouds do not obscure the sun its rays can be seen by night. It does not set or rise, so they declare, but merely passes across the horizon. The fact is that the land at this extremity of the earth is flat, and casts a low shadow: thus the darkness does not reach very high, and night falls below the level of the sky and stars.

Although the olive and the vine and the other peculiar products of warmer countries do not grow there, the soil is fertile and bears crops. They sprout up quickly, but are slow to ripen. The cause is in both cases the same—the abundant moisture of the ground and climate. Britain contains gold and silver and other metals, which reward our conquest. The sea also produces pearls: but they are of a dull leaden hue. Some attribute this to the divers' lack of skill: for in the Red Sea the oysters are torn alive and breathing from the rocks: while in Britain they are gathered as the sea casts them up. Personally I could sooner believe the pearls deficient in quality than mankind in greed.

(Agricola, c. 10, tr. W. H. Fyfe.)

§ 6 Military Engineering

Much might be said of the Latin descriptions of mechanical devices, such as the odometer, the water-clock, and the sundial, or of sanitary engineering, in which some of the greatest constructive achievements of the Romans were carried out. The passages in which these are described have, however, but little literary merit, and are therefore not included in this collection. For descriptions of such works the reader may be referred to the chapter on Science in the Legacy of Rome. We make, however, one quotation to illustrate the specially Roman subject of military engineering.

Of all departments of scientific activity, military engineering was that in which the Romans showed themselves most expert. There is a considerable Latin literature on the subject, nor were the Romans, as in so many other matters, wholly dependent here upon their predecessors. A good many of what have been humorously called 'military improvements' are of genuine Roman origin. These are especially connected with modes of attack and involve not only instruments but also engineering operations. Among the latter an especially lively description is that given by the greatest Roman adept in the Art of War of the manner in which his army crossed the Rhine.

CAESAR was now resolved to cross the Rhine. He was nevertheless strongly of the opinion that to do this by means of boats would neither be unattended by risk, nor worthy of his own or his country's dignity. The task on the other hand, of bridging a river of the width, depth, and rapidity of the Rhine, was no light one; and yet it must either be successfully grappled with, or else the army not be transported at all. The type of bridge he finally adopted was as follows. First of all, wooden posts, a foot and a half in diameter, sharpened a little from the end, and measured to the depth of the stream, were coupled in pairs at a distance of two feet. These were then placed in position by mechanical contrivance, and driven down into the bed of the river by rams, being set not like ordinary piles, directly perpendicular with the water, but tilted over at an angle in the direction of the current. This done, a similar set of posts, parallel to the first, but sloping against the force and rush of the tide, was carried across the stream forty feet farther down. Across each corresponding pair stout planks were next stretched, which, being of a width of two feet, exactly fitted the space between the separate posts, the whole framework being kept in position by a pair of under-braces running from either side. As these last crossed diagonally, and had free play at the point of section, the strain of the natural forces at work upon the structure

Reconstruction of Caesar's Landing on the Rhine the Middle of the Nineteenth Century

Photograph by the Rhine Commission

proved so nicely adjusted that the greater the impact of water against the posts the tighter they were clinched and held together. These large planks were then connected by lighter boards running transversely down the bridge, which in turn were overlaid with poles and fascines to form the floor. To protect the bridge when finished two breastworks were appended. On the side down stream a row of piles was driven out at an angle from either shore forming at the centre a sort of buttress, which being linked to the main fabric of the bridge was able to break the force of the current, while on the upper side the same formation was adopted at a little space above the bridge, whereby, in case the natives should launch trunks of trees or boats down the river for the purpose of wrecking the work, a stout buffer was interposed sufficient to break their shock and to prevent any real damage to the bridge.

Within ten days of the time at which the first timber reached their hands the engineers had finished the work, and the army passed to the farther shore.

(De Bell Gall. ii. 17, 18 T. P. Long.)

§ 7 Medicine

There is every reason to believe that the Romans made no contribution to Medicine in the restricted sense. Much was done in organizing the work of teaching and the city of Rome gave great opportunities to able Greek practitioners of whom Galen was chief. In the development of the subject itself, however, Romans played little part. It is thus the more strange that what is perhaps our best and clearest short account of medical practice in antiquity comes to us in Latin bearing the name of CELSUS. Of its author very little is known. He was evidently a cultured man who must have lived in Rome in the first half-century after the birth of Christ. He writes good Latin, is a close and accurate observer and has a humane and generous outlook. Nevertheless, there can be little doubt that the work is in the main a translation of a Greek compilation. Many of its Greek sources have been traced. The book itself formed part of an encyclopaedia of knowledge of which other fragments have survived.

Not the least remarkable portion of Celsus is the introduction

in which he claims dissection of the human body as a useful and humane process, but repudiates experimentation on living beings.

AS pains and various other disorders attack the internal parts, the members of the Methodist school believe no person can apply proper remedies to those parts of which he is ignorant; and, therefore, that it is necessary to dissect dead bodies, and examine their viscera and intestines, and that Herophilus and Erasistratus had taken for the best method for attaining that knowledge, who procured criminals out of prison, by royal permission, and, dissecting them alive,¹ contemplated, while they were even breathing, the parts which nature had before concealed; considering their position, colour, figure, size, order, hardness, softness, and smoothness; also the processes and depressions of each, or what is inserted into another part, or received another part into itself; for, they say, when there happens any inward pain, a person cannot discover the seat of that pain if he have not learned where every viscus or intestine is situated; nor can the part which suffers be cured by one who does not know what part it is; and that when the viscera happen to be exposed by a wound, if one is ignorant of the natural colour of each part, he cannot know what is sound and what corrupted; and for that reason is not qualified even to render first aid to the corrupted parts; besides they maintain that external remedies are applied with much more judgement when we are acquainted with the situation, figure, and size of the internal parts; and that the same reasoning holds in all the other instances above mentioned. And that it is by no means cruel by the tortures of a few guilty to search after remedies for the whole innocent race of mankind in all ages. . . .

But these things, however, which have been mentioned are only idle; but what remains is also cruel, to cut open the abdomen and præcordia of living men, and make that art which presides over the health of mankind the instrument not only of inflicting death, but of doing it in the most horrid manner, especially if it be considered that some of those things, which are sought after with so much barbarity, cannot be known at all, and others may be known without any cruelty, for that the colour, smoothness, softness bardness and such like are not the same in a wounded body as they were in a sound, and further because these qualities, even in bodies that have suffered no external violence, are often changed by fear, grief, hunger, indigestion, fatigue and a thousand other inconsiderable disorders, which makes it much more probable that the internal parts, which are far the more tender and never exposed to the light itself, are changed by the severest wounds and mangling And that nothing can be more ridiculous than to imagine anything to be the same in a dying man, nay, one already dead, as it is in a living person, for that the abdomen indeed may be opened while a man breathes, but as soon as the knife has reached the præcordia, and the midriff is cut, which by a kind of membrane divides the upper from the lower parts (and by the Greeks is called the diaphragm), the man immediately expires, and thus the præcordia and all the viscera never come into view of the butchering physician till the man is dead, and they must necessarily appear as those of a dead person, and not as they were while he lived, and thus the physician gains only the opportunity of murdering a man cruelly, and not of observing what are the appearances of the viscera in a living person, if, however, there be anything which can be observed in a person that yet breathes chance often throws it in the way of such as practise the healing art, for that sometimes a gladiator on the stage, a soldier in the field or a traveller beset by robbers, is so wounded that some internal part, different in different people, may be disposed to view, and thus a prudent physician finds their situation, position, order, figure, and the other particulars he wants to know, not perpetrating murder, but attempting to give health, and learns that by compassion which others had discovered by horrid cruelty But for these reasons it is not necessary to lacerate even dead bodies ; which, though not cruel, yet may be shocking to the sight, since most things are different in dead bodies ; and even the dressing of wounds shows all that can be discovered in the living.

¹ This charge was repeated by early Christian writers. There can be no doubt, however, that it is baseless. Herophilus and Erasistratus lived c. 290 B. C.

(Praef., 23-6, 40-4, tr. Grieve, revised.)

§ 8. Nature Study.

In the study and observation of Nature, Roman Art, as has been shown in the Legacy of Rome (pp. 265-7), shows a peculiar interest which is reflected in Roman literature. In Nature Study as in other scientific departments, we must not seek among the Romans for any great general ideas, nor for leading scientific principles. Of shrewd, though not always original, observation of the ways and characters of animals and the habits of plants there is ample store. Perhaps the best known of these observations are to be found in the works of Virgil. These, however, have the glamour of poetry upon them. Simpler, earlier, perhaps a more characteristic product of the average Roman outlook is the work of the learned old country gentleman VARRO.¹ Doubtless many of his ideas are taken from Aristotle and other Greek writers, but Varro has a manner, a style, and an approach of his own. We choose for quotation part of his account of bees, which always attracted the attention of ancient naturalists : readers of Virgil's Fourth Georgic (see pp. 120 ff.) will see that he drew on Varro for much of his material.

BEES are produced in some cases by bees, in others by the putrefying carcase of an ox. Wherefore Archelaus describes them in one of his epigrams as ' wandering children of a heifer dead ' and again tells us that ' wasps are of horses bred and bees of calves '. Bees are not solitary by nature as eagles are, but gregarious like men. You may urge that jackdaws also are gregarious. But they are not gregarious to the same extent as bees, for the latter combine to work and build, which jackdaws do not. Bees possess both art and method ; from them we learn to work, to build and to store our food. For it is with these three things that they are concerned, food, houses, and work, nor is the wax identical with their food, their honey or their house. Each cell has six angles one for each of the bee's feet And the geometers tell us that a regular hexagon described within a circle occupies a larger portion of the circle than any other figure They feed out of doors and work within the fruit of their labours being that which both gods and men love for its exceeding sweetness for the honey-comb gets as far as the altar and honey is served at the beginning of dinner and again for the second course Their communities are like those of men for they have a king and government and social organization They have a passion for all things that are clean And therefore none of them will ever settle on a spot that is defiled or smells foully nor even on a man scented with fragrant ointment Indeed if a man thus anointed goes near them they sting him whereas flies lick him Consequently bees are never seen to settle on flesh or blood or fat, as flies are wont to do Therefore they settle only on such things as have a sweet taste The bee is the most harmless of things for it spoils no man's work by pulling it to pieces and yet it has the courage to withstand any that seek to disturb it although at the same time it is conscious of its own weakness Therefore they are with reason styled the birds of the Muses since if scattered they can be recalled to one spot by the rhythmical clashing of cymbals or clapping of hands and just as men have assigned Helicon and Olympus as dwelling places to the Muses so to bees nature has assigned wild mountains rich in flowers They follow their king¹ wheresoever he goes and hold him up if he be weary while if he cannot fly they bear him on their necks in their desire to save him They are never idle themselves and hate those that are Wherefore they harrj the drones and drive them from the nest since they give no help to the community and eat the honey and you may see a number of drones crying aloud for mercy and pursued by a few bees Outside the door of the hive they block up all chinks whereby wind might get at the comb with a substance which the Greeks style erithace They all live like soldiers in an army sleeping and working by equal relays and send out colonies whose leaders cause certain things to be accomplished at the sound of their voice, which is like a trumpet-call. This they do when they make signals of war or peace one to another. . . . (Res Rusticae, iii. 16.)

¹ See pp. 285 ff., 357.

We may quote one other passage from the same work to show the kind of observation of nature which was prevalent in Varro's day. It deals from the agricultural point of view first with snails and then with dormice.¹

SAID Axius, Your part, my friend Merula, has been made lighter by Appius. The second act, which concerned hunting, has been quickly gone through, and as for what remains—snails and dormice—I am not anxious to hear about them, as the subject can present no great difficulty. More than you think, Axius my dear fellow, said Appius, for you have to find a suitable place for your snail-beds, and it must be open to the sky and entirely surrounded by water, lest when you put snails in it to breed you find not only the children gone, but the mothers as well. You must, I repeat, keep them confined by means of water, or else you will have to get a 'slave-catcher'.

The best spot is one visited by dew and not baked by the sun. If there is none such provided by nature—which is usually the case in a sunny place—and you do not chance to have a shady spot in which to make your snail-bed, at the foot of mountain rocks, for instance, the base of which is bathed by a lake or streams, you will have to make a dewy place artificially. This is done by getting a hose-pipe with small teats attached to it which squirt water on to some stone near by, so that the water is splashed in all directions.

Snails need little food and no one to give it to them; they discover it, as they crawl about, on the floor of the enclosure, and even find it, unless they are stopped by a stream, by climbing the upright walls. And indeed while they are on the huckster's stall they manage to keep alive for a long time by chewing the cud, with the help of a few bay leaves thrown amongst them and a sprinkling of bran And so the cook as a rule does not know whether they are alive or dead when he is cooking them

¹ The larger species known in French as loir.

There are several varieties of snails the small white ones brought from near Reate, the big ones from Illyrium, and those of middle size which come from Africa Not but what they differ in these places both in distribution and size, for instance, very big snails come from Africa Solitannae, which are so big that three gallons can be put into their shells And similarly in other countries snails though of the same kind differ in size from one another When breeding they lay an incalculable number of young which are very small and have a soft shell that bardens as time goes on When large islands are made in the enclosures the snails bring you a big haul of pence They are, I may add, fattened usually in the following way A jar for them to feed in having holes in it is lined with a mixture of *sapa*¹ and spelt It must have these holes that air may get in The snail is certainly very tenacious of life

The account of the dormice is briefer, but not less interesting

THE place where dormice are kept is of a different kind as it is an enclosure bounded not by water, but by a wall the whole of which is faced on the inside with smooth stone or plaster, to prevent the dormouse from crawling out In it should be small acorn bearing trees When these are not bearing, acorns and chestnuts should be thrown inside the wall for the dormice to eat their fill Fairly wide holes are to be made for them in which they can bring forth their young There should not be much water as they take but little of it, and like a dry place They are fattened in jars, which many people keep inside the villa These jars made by the potter differ greatly in their construction from other as grooves are made in their sides, and a hollow in which to place food Into this jar are put acorns walnuts, or chestnuts A lid is put on the jars and in the darkness the dormice grow fat
(Res Rusticae, iii 14 15 tr L. Storr Best)

¹ New wine boiled thick

§ 9. Attitude towards Nature.

The attitude of the Roman toward the world in which he lived is reflected chiefly in his philosophy. Yet much of this material so closely borders on science that we must give it some attention.

The Roman thinker, as we have seen, leaned as a rule towards either the Stoic or the Epicurean school. The Stoics laid very great emphasis on the relation of man's fate to that of the circling heavens which enclosed him and his world. Their conception of the world, thus linked with astrology, tended to be peculiarly mechanical: all in life seemed determinate. Nor was the universe of the Epicurean any less determinate. But the determinism of the atomistic Epicureans differed from that of the Stoics in being less mathematical and mechanical. However much Lucretius might believe in atoms, he would yet be bound to admit that his actual knowledge of these atoms was negligible. He might make a scheme that explained the workings of the world by means of his atomistic theory, but he could not predict immediate future happenings. Savoir afin de prévoir has been said to be the aim of science. It is a knowledge that the Stoic could claim—however falsely. But the Epicurean could give no detailed prevision in the astrological manner. And so, in practice, Epicurean thought gave a little more rein to speculation than Stoic. It is thus less wonder that we find in LUCRETIUS certain anticipations of modern scientific ideas such as are not encountered in Stoic writings. Among the most remarkable of these is a famous passage in which Lucretius seems to speak in terms of organic evolution.

FIRST of all the earth gave birth to the tribes of herbage and bright verdure all around the hills and over all the plains, the flowering fields gleamed in their green hue, and thereafter the diverse trees were started with loose rein on their great race of growing through the air. Even as down and hair and bristles are first formed on the limbs of four-footed beasts and the body of fowls strong of wing, so then the new-born earth raised up herbage and shrubs first, and thereafter produced the races of mortal things, many races born in many ways by diverse means. For neither can living animals have fallen from the sky nor the beasts of earth have issued forth from the salt pools.

It remains that rightly has the earth won the name of mother, since out of earth all things are produced. And even now many animals spring forth from the earth formed by the rains and the warm heat of the sun: wherefore we may wonder the less if then more animals and greater were born reaching their full growth when earth and air were fresh. First of all the tribe of winged fowls and the diverse birds left their eggs hatched out in the spring season as now in the summer the grasshoppers of their own will leave their smooth shells seeking life and livelihood. Then it was that the earth first gave birth to the race of mortal things. For much heat and moisture abounded then in the fields thereby wherever a suitable spot or place was afforded there grew up wombs clinging to the earth by their roots and when in the fullness of time the age of the little ones fleeing moisture and eager for air had opened them nature would turn to that place the pores in the earth and constrain them to give forth from their opened veins a sap most like to milk even as now every woman when she has brought forth is filled with sweet milk because all the current of her nourishment is turned towards her paps. The earth furnished food for the young the warmth raiment the grass a couch rich in much soft down. But the youth of the world called not into being hard frosts nor exceeding heat nor winds of mighty violence, for all things grow and come to their strength in like degrees.

(De rerum nat. v. 783-820)

Stoic and Epicurean however they might differ on other counts were at one in their belief that all things were in fact determinate. They were thus both freed from the wild fears which haunted the ancient world fears that were played upon by the bizarre oriental religious sects which flourished in the hotbed of decaying Roman society. The philosophers of both Stoic and Epicurean schools held their heads high above the base belief in Magic which followed these religions as the shadow does the substance. But among the less educated the belief in bewitchments and magical workings became an obsession in the degenerate social system of the later Empire. The magical beliefs of antiquity and the repudiation of them by the educated classes are well reflected in the writings of Apuleius.

APULEIUS of Madaura in North Africa (fl. c. A.D. 150, see pp. 267 ff., 482 f.) is remembered to-day chiefly as the author of that delightful novel The Golden Ass. He, however, considered himself to be a philosopher and man of science. He was accused of having bewitched a rich widow to marry him, and his defence has survived. In the passage quoted he is explaining that if he did collect strange fish it was in the interests of science and not of the Black Art. The passage is interesting as showing that he actually dissected the specimens brought him, and further that the creature was probably the very beast which he denies it to be, the Sea Hare, a mollusc (Aplysia irritans) which actually contains a number of small bony structures set round the alimentary canal and serving to grind up its food. Apuleius's description is sufficiently accurate. The bones are set very close together and adhere to the wall of the canal.

'BUT', says my adversary, 'for what purpose save evil did you dissect the fish brought you by your servant Themison?' As if I had not told you just now that I write treatises on the organs of all kinds of animals, describing the place, number and purpose of their various parts, diligently investigating Aristotle's works on anatomy and adding to them where necessary. I am, therefore, greatly surprised that you are only aware of my having inspected one small fish, although I have actually inspected a very large number under all circumstances wherever I might find them, and have, moreover, made no secret of my researches, but conducted them openly before all the world, so that the merest stranger may, if it please him, stand by and observe me. In this I follow the instruction of my masters, who assert that a free man of free spirit should as far as possible wear his thoughts upon his face. Indeed I actually showed this small fish, which you call a sea-hare, to many who stood by. I do not yet know what name to call it without closer research, since in spite of its rarity and most remarkable characteristics I do not find it described by any of the ancient philosophers. This fish is, as far as my knowledge extends, unique in one respect, for it contains twelve bones resembling the knuckle-bones of a sucking pig, linked together like a chain in its belly. Apart from this it is boneless. Had Aristotle known this, Aristotle who records as a most remarkable phenomenon the fact that the fish known as the small sea ass alone of all fishes has its diminutive heart placed in its stomach, he would assuredly have mentioned the fact.

(Apologia, c. 40)

§ 10 Man's Place in Nature

There is one aspect of scientific thought which most closely trenches on the domains of religion and of philosophy. It is man's estimate of his place in Nature. It passes imperceptibly into his attitude to his fellow man and to his God. The Roman outlook was here profoundly modified by the advent of Christianity. Nevertheless, long before Christian influence made itself felt, many of the social elements, thought by some to be characteristic of that religion, had come to the fore. The benevolent activities of the guilds, the building of hospitals, legal restraint of abortion and of the exposure of children, pleadings for the merciful treatment of slaves, impassioned outbursts against gladiatorial shows, claims that all men had like rights—all these were to be seen in Rome of the first century of the Christian era. Nor can that society have been wholly abandoned which heard the teaching of the missionary sage, the perfect Stoic, Epictetus, who dubs himself a follower of the Cynic school.

'A slave and cripple, Epictetus trod
This earth in penury—the friend of God'

The brotherhood of man and the fatherhood of God is preached in notes clear, if somewhat thin, by Seneca—'They are slaves did I hear some one say?' he asks. 'No not slaves, comrades, unpretentious friends or—if you will—our fellow slaves for we are all slaves to Fate' (Fp mor xlvii) yet 'superior to Fate can no man rise save by God's aid' (xli § 2). Seneca's is the phrase 'See you a man unmoved in danger, untouched by desire, happy in adversity, calm in the storm looking on men from above ranging himself as with the gods, will you not say "upon that man a divine power has descended"?' (xli § 4). He is echoed in Sir Henry Wotton's Lord of Himself.

But these are high standards, nor without better sanctions than he possessed could the Roman sustain them. A surer reflex of Roman feeling as to man's place in nature is given by less perfect Stoics such as PLINY. It is in his cynical, pitiless, and hopeless vision of Man's place in Nature that we get the real index of Roman feeling.

PRIDE of place will rightly be given to man, for whose sake Nature seems to have generated all other things, though she exacts so huge, so cruel a price for her bounty, that it is hard to tell whether she is to be regarded as the best of parents or the most unkind of step-mothers.

In the first place she clothes man, alone of all her offspring, with the spoils of other creatures. To the rest she has given diverse coverings, each after their kind, shells, crusts, spines, hides, fur, bristles, hair, down, feathers, scales and fleeces; even the trunks of trees she has protected from cold and heat by enveloping them in bark, which is sometimes double. Man alone at his birth she casts naked on the naked earth to wail and cry; man only of all her many creatures does she expose to tears; and they begin to flow at the very commencement of his life. But as for laughter, in good truth, it is granted to none before his fortieth day at the very earliest and then only to the most precocious of children. Such is our introduction to the light, and forthwith we suffer a lot from which even the wild beasts born in this world of ours are exempt; for chains are cast about us and every limb is wrapped in swaddling-bands. Man, born under such a happy star, man the lord of creation, lies bound hand and foot, weeping and wailing, and begins his life a captive for no other crime than the mere fact of being born. Alas for the madness of those that deem that, despite such a woeful entrance into the world, they are born to flaunt their pride. The first presage of strength, the first gift of time makes him like to a four-footed beast. How soon can he walk? or talk? How soon is his mouth firm enough to eat? How long his head continues to pulse at the crown, thereby proclaiming him the feeblest of all living things!

Then come diseases in all their thousands, and remedies devised to heal each one of them, and even the remedies ever and anon are baffled by new forms of sickness. But other creatures realize their powers; swiftness in some, in others rapid flight or swimming, while man learns only what he is taught, and cannot speak, walk or feed, or in a word do aught of his own nature save weep. And so there have been many who have thought it happiest never to have been born or, once born, once more to be with all speed as though they had never been. Of all creatures one alone knows grief, one alone knows luxury, aye, luxury in all its forms, appealing to every member of his body. One only is acquainted with ambition, avarice and the insatiable desire to live, one only is vexed with superstition, with care for the burial of his body and even with what shall be when he is gone. None has a firmer hold of life, none such wild appetite for all things, none is subject to such a welter of fear, none to such mad outbursts of rage. In a word, other animals live honestly with their own kind. We see like gather to like and stand fast against those of a different breed. The lion's fierceness fights not its own kin, the serpent's tooth spares serpents, not even the monsters of the deep and fish vent their rage save against other kinds. But, in good truth, most of man's evils are sprung from man.

(Nat. Hist., vii. 1.)

Then come diseases in all their thousands, and remedies devised to heal each one of them, and even the remedies ever and anon are baffled by new forms of sickness. But other creatures realize their powers; swiftness in some, in others rapid flight or swimming, while man learns only what he is taught, and cannot speak, walk or feed, or in a word do aught of his own nature save weep. And so there have been many who have thought it happiest never to have been born or, once born, once more to be with all speed as though they had never been. Of all creatures one alone knows grief, one alone knows luxury, aye luxury in all its forms appealing to every member of his body. One only is acquainted with ambition, avarice and the insatiable desire to live, one only is vexed with superstition, with care for the burial of his body and even with what shall be when he is gone. None has a firmer hold of life, none such wild appetite for all things, none is subject to such a welter of fear, none to such mad outbursts of rage. In a word, other animals live honestly with their own kind. We see like gather to like and stand fast against those of a different breed. The lion's fierceness fights not its own kin, the serpent's tooth spares serpents, not even the monsters of the deep and fish vent their rage save against other kinds. But, in good truth, most of man's evils are sprung from man.

(Nat Hist, vii 1.)